Every Favour a Debt

. . .

A Novel

Every Favour a Debt

A work of fiction. Names, characters, places and incidents are products of the imagination or are used fictitiously. Any resemblance to actual persons, living or dead, is entirely coincidental.

For adult readers.

First edition.

Typeset on a 6 × 9 inch page. Printed page numbers appear at the foot of each page from the contents onward.

Contents

The Dedication 5

Registrations 20

Clients in the Morning 36

What the Baths Know 52

A Short History of Stairs 68

The Avidii at Dinner 82

Paper 97

The Alexandrians 112

An Inquiry 128

Transtiberim 144

The Sealed Tablet 158

Negotiations 172

Cornelia's Voice 188

The Committee Reports 204

Saturnalia Postponed 220

A Funeral Across the River 235

In the Order of the Evening 249

Marcus Learns a Word 264

The Borrowed Spring 279

The Clause 297

A Wedding in the Morning 314

Letters from Athens 332

The Vintage 349

What the Column Shows 366

Every Favour a Debt 384

Chapter One

The Dedication

. . .

She is early, because to be late in this city is to be read as careless, and careless women are charged more for everything. The morning is still blue at the edges. Below the Caelian the streets are already loud with handcarts and muleteers swearing at the gradient, with slaves carrying water up from the fountains in jars that knock against their hips. Antonia Cassia stands in her own courtyard and puts her hand, quite flat, to the painted plaster to feel whether the damp has come through again in the night. It has. A bloom of cold under the red. She makes a note of it in the part of her mind where repairs live, between the price of Falernian and the name of the fuller who does not steal.

Diomedes is waiting with the tablets. He does not look at her face first. He looks at her hands, as clerks do, to see if she is ready to hold a stylus or only to listen. “The dedication crowds will close the Forum by the third hour,” he says. “If the wine is to come up from the warehouses today it must come now.”

“Then now,” she says. “And pay the carter before he unloads, not after. I am tired of his face at the kitchen door.”

He marks it. The wax takes the point with a small, neat resistance that she has always liked. Everything in this house should resist a little before it yields. The doors. The accounts. The women, when a guest mistakes payment for ownership. Herself, most of all, when she is asked a question whose answer would be useful to the asker.

The house wakes in sections, like a theatre being lit from the back. First the kitchen yard, where the night porter hands his keys to the morning boy with a recital of grievances against the weather, the watch, and a cat that has adopted the woodpile and is raising, by the sound of it, a dynasty. Then the kitchen itself: fires coaxed, yesterday's ash raked out and saved in a bucket for the fuller, because nothing in this house is thrown away until two people have agreed it cannot be sold, fed to something, or used to clean something else. Then water. A house on the Caelian drinks uphill. Every jar in it has come up the street on a human back, and Antonia, who carried water professionally in her youth, in a town built of stairs, has opinions about waste that she expresses without raising her voice and without repetition. The household can recite them. Guests, who are charged for waste in ways they never identify on the bill, are spared the recital.

Barbatus does the doors at first light, not because the street is dangerous at dawn — the street at dawn is full of bakers' boys and old women, Rome's true garrison — but because a door opened carelessly sets the tone of a day. He stands in the entrance in his vast, weathered calm and looks up and down the street the way he once looked across sand: not for enemies, exactly; for intentions. Tradesmen read him correctly and moderate theirs. A fishmonger's boy who arrived in November intending to short-weight the house on mullet now brings the mullet up to the threshold holding the scales like a votive offering. Barbatus has never threatened him. Barbatus, who spent eleven years being professionally threatened for the entertainment of thousands, has retired from the genre.

“The fish is better than the boy,” he reports to the kitchen, which is his way of passing an invoice.

Antonia does her first round while the house is still honest. Later, with the lamps lit and the hangings down and musicians tuning in the small room, the place will put on the face it is paid for; but at this hour it shows her what it is: a machine for converting money into ease, with all the belts and buckets visible. She checks the great dining room where last night's Alexandrians argued about harbour dues until the lamps drowned in their own oil. The floor has been washed; a couch has a wine stain blooming on its cover like a small purple province; somebody — a guest, a servant, history will not be told — has left a ring on the window ledge, gold, with a stone the colour of weak tea. She picks it up and holds it to the light. In her first years in Rome a ring like that, lost in her rooms, would have gone to the Greek by noon and come back as rent. Now she puts it in the box in Diomedes' office labelled, in his upright hand, Guests' Property, Forgotten, where it will wait to be claimed by a man who will arrive at dusk in a panic of discretion, having told his wife one story and his steward another. He will overpay the house for its silence in some future transaction, never knowing he has done it, and the ring will have earned more in the box than it ever would at the Greek's. This is what Antonia means when she tells the younger women that honesty is a long position. They think she is joking. Eirene, who has seen the box's contents turn over the years like a small, glittering tide — rings, a senator's seal-stone, once, memorably, a set of false teeth in a cedar case — knows she is not.

In the kitchen the pastry cook is already at war. He is from Alexandria, he is called Ammonius, and he regards Roman cooking the way Roman generals regard other people's countries: as raw material awaiting improvement. This morning's enemy is the price of pine nuts, which has risen, and the quality of the honey, which in his formulation has fallen morally. Antonia listens to the whole dispatch while tasting yesterday's stock. It is a ritual. He requires an audience with the power to fund him; she requires him to believe the funding is in doubt, because a cook who feels secure begins to cook for other cooks, and other cooks do not pay her bills.

“You may have the pine nuts,” she says at last, “at the old price, from the man in the Forum Boarium. Tell him the house remembers the short measure at Saturnalia. He will remember being remembered.”

“And the honey?”

“The honey is from our own man outside the Colline Gate. If it has fallen morally, Ammonius, it has done so in your storeroom, among your jars, under your seal.” She rinses the spoon herself — a hairdresser's daughter does not leave spoons; it is the same religion as the hair — and puts it back in its place. “Reform it.”

Ammonius bows with the grandeur of a man accepting a province and turns back to his fires, already composing the menu for a night still twelve hours away, while the kitchen boy — eleven years old, freeborn, apprenticed by a mother who came to Antonia first for a midwife's fee and stayed, over the years, for arithmetic lessons she pretends are recipes — mouths the words fallen morally over the onions with the deep satisfaction of a person stocking a phrase for later use. Antonia sees him do it. She lets him keep it. A house survives on what its people steal from it in language.

Upstairs, the women are waking in the order of their engagements, which is to say that Philomela, who sang until the second watch, is not waking at all, and has hung a strip of red wool on her door, the house's flag for a voice is sleeping; knock and be billed. Daphne is awake and practising scales at a volume calculated to annoy nobody who matters. There are rules here too, arrived at over eleven years and written nowhere, which is why they work: no woman in this house descends to the dining rooms before she has eaten; no woman entertains a guest who has struck a servant, once, anywhere, on any provocation — Rome calls this an eccentricity and pays a premium for it; no woman's earnings pass through any hand but Diomedes', and his pass through Antonia's every quarter, in her presence, with the tablets open. Twice a year a new arrival, hired from some lodging house by the theatres where the rules were different, tests the ones about money. Twice a year Antonia explains, sitting down, in the small room, that she did not climb out of Baiae on stairs of other women's wages and does not intend to be carried up fresh ones. The explanation takes four minutes. It has not yet needed repeating to the same woman.

She is on the stairs herself when the carter arrives early, contrary to instruction, and with only half the wine. She hears Barbatus admit him to the yard and hears, in the quality of the cart's complaining axle, a story preparing itself: the warehouses, the dedication crowds, a mule with opinions. By the time she reaches the yard the man has got as far as the mule.

“The other half,” Antonia says, “is where?”

“Coming, mistress. On the second cart. By the third hour, the fourth at the outside. The Forum—”

“The Forum was built over twelve years. It did not surprise the warehouses this morning.” She looks at the amphorae he has brought: sealed, stamped, the Falernian she ordered, a cheaper Campanian she did not, riding among them like a poor relation in a good cloak. She rests her hand, quite gently, on the shoulder of one of the impostors. “And these?”

The carter looks at Barbatus. Barbatus looks at the street. It is a conversation men have in this yard about twice a year, usually at the point where someone's arithmetic meets hers.

“A mistake at loading,” the carter says. “It being dark.”

“Then it can be unloaded in the light. Take the Campanian back, bring the rest of the Falernian by the third hour, and I will pay the full contract, including today's cartage, as agreed. Bring it by the fourth, and I will pay for the wine and not the cartage, because the afternoon of an imperial dedication is not when I conduct my cellar down a public street. Bring me another mistake in the dark at any hour you choose—” she takes her hand off the amphora “—and you may explain the darkness to the Greek at the Basilica, who holds your note for the mule. He holds most people's notes. It is why his office is so quiet.”

The carter begins unloading with the energy of a man who has just remembered an appointment with honesty. Diomedes, arriving with a stylus, records the amended delivery without expression. He has a category for this in the day-book. Every house in Rome has, whether it writes it down or not: attempted, at dawn, in the dark. Antonia watches a moment longer, to give the lesson its full weight of witness, and it is while she is standing in the yard among the amphorae, with the January light coming up over the roofs and the whole city beginning to make its dedication-day noise below the hill, that she hears the courtyard door, and Eirene's step on the stones.

Eirene comes across the courtyard with a bowl of warm water and a cloth over her arm, her hair still pinned for sleep. She is Antonia's age and has the particular beauty of women who have stopped arranging their faces for other people before noon. “You have ink on your jaw,” Eirene says.

“Then I was working in my sleep.”

“You were working instead of it.” Eirene wipes the mark away. Her fingers are cool. “The new hanging is here. The embroiderer herself brought it. She would not give it to the porter.”

“Good for her. Give her breakfast and keep her from Barbatus. He thinks courtesy is a kind of wrestling.”

Diomedes turns a tablet over. “There is also a notice. From the aediles' office. It was left before dawn, which is either diligence or a wish not to be seen leaving it.”

Antonia takes it. The seal is correct. The hand is a clerk's hand, trained to make threats look like administration. An inspection. A review of contributions, of registrations, of the uses to which rooms in this insula are put after dark. Words that have been washed so often they no longer smell of anything: order, decency, precedent. At the foot, a name cited as proposing the review to the Senate's committee. She reads it twice, not because she doubts her eyes but because her eyes, at thirty-eight, prefer close work in better light, and because she wants the small delay in which a feeling can be put down somewhere it will not be seen.

Gnaeus Cornelius Lentulus.

Eirene is watching her. Diomedes is very interested in the courtyard roses, which are overwatered and know it.

“Well,” Antonia says. “The emperor dedicates a forum today, and Lentulus dedicates himself to my drains. We all build what we can.”

She hands the notice back. “File it with the tax receipts. Answer nothing today. If a man sends a clerk before dawn he wants a reply before noon, and I have never yet let Lentulus set the hour in my house.”

■

He is being shaved when his son comes in, which means he cannot turn his head, which means his son must say whatever he has come to say to a profile held still by another man's hand. Gnaeus Cornelius Lentulus has found, over twenty years of public life, that a razor at the throat improves the quality of other people's sentences. They become shorter. They become, if not honest, at least economical.

“The Forum today,” the boy says. He is twenty and calls this an opening.

“Yes.”

“Shall I ride with you or with Uncle Postumus?”

“With me. Postumus will talk through the sacrifices and then claim he foresaw the omens.”

The barber's thumb pulls the skin taut under his jaw. In the mirror — polished bronze, his grandfather's, the rim dented where a slave dropped it the winter the Tiber froze at the edges — Lentulus can see his son shift from foot to foot in a way that his tutors were paid to correct and did not. The boy has his mother's height and, Lentulus thinks, with the clarity that comes when one may not move, none of his mother's patience and all of his own appetite for being elsewhere.

“There is talk,” the boy says, “about your proposal. The inspections.”

“There is always talk. It is the city's second water supply.”

“They say it is aimed. At one house in particular.”

The razor pauses. The barber, who has shaved three consuls and buried two, knows when a household has stepped on its own hem.

“Who are they, Marcus?” Lentulus asks.

“Men at the baths. Men who owe me money at dice and pay in information because it is cheaper.”

“A proposal on registrations is aimed at everyone who has failed to register. If one house feels it more than others, that may be because one house has grown very large on very small paperwork.” He can hear how well this will sound in the Senate, and how thin it sounds here, with soap on his neck. “You will not repeat bath-house talk at the dedication. You will stand where you are put, you will be seen to attend to the emperor, and you will remember that your sister's negotiations require this family to look like a wall, not a window.”

Marcus bows, correctly, which in this family is what young men do instead of slamming doors the slaves would have to repair.

When he has gone, the barber resumes. “Shall I leave the scar, dominus?”

The scar is small, under the left ear, older than the boy who just left the room. Lentulus says, “You always leave the scar, Felix. It is not a decision I need to make fresh each morning.”

“No, dominus.” Felix wipes the blade. “Some men like to think it is.”

Out in the atrium the ancestral masks look down from their cupboards, wax faces darkened by smoke and time, each with its painted inscription: offices held, triumphs voted, provinces governed. Lentulus passes them as he passes them every morning, with the brief, involuntary arithmetic of the living: what he has added, what he has merely maintained, what the debts secured against the Campanian estates would look like if debts were inscribed under a man's name as offices are. He touches nothing. A Cornelius does not touch the masks for luck. He behaves as if luck were a vulgarity other families require.

His wife is at the household shrine, making the morning offering with the household gathered in the order she has arranged and rearranged over nineteen years until it looks like nature. Servilia does not look up when he joins her. She pours, she speaks the words, she sets the cup down exactly within the ring its predecessors have left on the stone. Only when the slaves have withdrawn does she say, “You sent the notice before dawn.”

“The aediles sent it. I proposed a review. These are distinct actions.”

“In the Senate they will be. At dinner they will not.” She straightens the fold of his toga where it crosses his chest. Her hands are expert and entirely without tenderness, which is not the same as without care. “If you mean to make war on that woman, Lentulus, do it in daylight and win it quickly. This family has a daughter to marry. We cannot afford a siege that everyone in Rome watches while eating."

"I do not make war on women," he says.

"No," Servilia says. "You make proposals. Rome will supply the war."

Servilia leaves him to the dressing, which in this house is a liturgy with a staff. The toga is not put on a senator; it is built around him, fold by negotiated fold, by a slave whose grandfather dressed a Cornelius for a triumph and whose professional opinion, delivered through his hands, is that the modern chest is narrower and the modern occasion fatter. Lentulus stands for it the way he stands for clients: as an act of office performed by other people's competence. In the bronze mirror his reflection is assembled by degrees out of the room's grey light — first a shape, then a senator, then, if you know where to look, which Felix does and the dresser does and Servilia has for nineteen years, the man inside the arrangement, holding still.

"Your father," the dresser says — he is old enough to be allowed uncommissioned sentences, a liberty the household grants by age the way Antonia's grants by invoice — "wore his to the left an inch further. For the sword arm, he said. There was no sword, in the Forum, in my memory."

"There was always a sword in my father's memory," Lentulus says. "It is what the memory was for."

He does not say — the room is not one of his locked ones, it is full of hands — that he has started, this winter, to hear his father's sentences arriving in his own voice at committee pitch: order, decency, precedent, the washed words, the ones that have been through the fullers so often they have lost their original colour and can be worn to anything. At twenty-four he believed a man chose his vocabulary the way he chose his friends. At forty-five he knows a man's vocabulary is issued to him, like the toga's folds, by people who dressed his grandfather, and that the freedom lies, if it lies anywhere, in the inch to the left or right that nobody else notices.

Cornelia is in the corridor when he comes out, which means she has timed it, which means Servilia knows she has timed it and has permitted the corridor as a theatre. She is dressed for the dedication in the white of a senator's unmarried daughter — a colour that is also a locked room, and better guarded than most in this house — and she has her mother's way of asking a question by arranging to be present when it answers itself.

“Will the emperor speak?” she asks.

“He will dedicate. Speaking is what the inscriptions do afterwards, at greater length and with fewer interruptions.”

“Marcus says the column will have the whole war on it, going round and round.”

“Marcus says a great many things going round and round.” But he says it without the edge he keeps for the boy in public, and his daughter receives the distinction the way she receives everything in this family: filed, accurately, for a future she is not yet charging interest on. “The war will go round and round, yes. Wars do, on stone. It saves the survivors the trouble of describing the parts no one can see from the ground.”

She thinks about this with her whole forehead. At sixteen her thinking is still visible, a condition her education is designed to cure by the vintage. “Who is it for, then? The part nobody can see.”

“The gods,” her father says, because it is the answer the dedication requires, and then — the inch to the left, unnoticed by anyone except the girl it was always going to matter to — “and the people who carried the baskets. Someday somebody will climb up inside it and read it all. Historians,” he says, “are just clients who arrive very late and cannot be turned away.”

Cornelia nods as if a purse of the middle size has been placed, correctly, in her hands. Servilia, appearing at the corridor's end with the household deploying behind her like a fleet in line, takes in father, daughter, and the exact quality of the moment she has scheduled, and says only, “The litters,” which in her Latin covers a multitude of approvals she would regard it as wasteful to itemise.

■

By the third hour the new Forum is a press of white wool and oiled hair and January sun striking gilding fit to blind a man into piety. Trajan moves through his own magnificence like a surveyor who happens to own the land: a soldier-emperor among columns, basilicas, libraries rising in Greek and Latin on either side of a courtyard where a column will stand when the carvers have finished telling the Dacian wars in a spiral no one at ground level will ever fully read. Antonia, who has no business being seen at an imperial dedication and every business seeing it, stands at the margin with Eirene and a veil drawn in the respectable style, in the company of contractors' wives and a dealer in purple dye who owes her money and is therefore delighted to make room.

She does not look for Lentulus. This is a discipline, like not touching a loose tooth. She looks instead at the stone-cutters' marks still visible on a base course, at a secretary of the emperor's household she knows to be short-sighted and vain about it, at the way the crowd makes a lane for men it believes important and closes, just as instinctively, against men it has finished with. Power in Rome is mostly this: a lane opening.

The dealer in purple is called Gaius Septimius, he dyes for half the bridal trade of Rome, and he owes Antonia nine hundred sesterces on a note she bought from his landlord in the autumn, at a discount, for reasons that were partly business and partly that the landlord's son had beaten a servant in her house two years ago and she collects such accounts in whatever currency presents itself. Septimius does not know she holds the note. He knows she is a woman who once found him, at two days' notice, a buyer for a consignment of cloth ruined — improved, he said at the time, sweating — by an apprentice's error with the mordant. Gratitude of that vintage does not thin. He makes room for her and Eirene beside his wife, a gaunt, handsome woman with dyer's hands she hides in public inside her sleeves, and launches, by way of rent on the standing space, into the cost of everything in sight.

“You see the gilding on the basilica entablature? Gold leaf, Antonia. Not wash. Leaf. My cousin had the contract for the glue alone and bought a farm at Tibur.”

“Then the empire is in good health,” Antonia says. “When the glue men are buying farms, the world is sticking together.”

Septimius' wife makes a sound inside her veil that is either a laugh or a cough being strangled for respectability. Eirene, who has the stillness of a woman listening with her whole skin, says, “Tell her about the library steps. He has been telling the street all morning. It improves with an audience that pays by the piece.”

But Antonia is not listening to Septimius, not with the front of her mind. She is doing what she does in every crowd: reading it as a ledger. There — a contractor who supplied lime for the Forum vaults, gone rich and strange with it, wearing a ring on every finger as if his hands were a manifesto; his wife assessing other wives' jewellery with the care of a money-changer at a doubtful coin. There — two young equestrians she dined last month, deep in an attempt to look senatorial, an aspiration their tailors have funded and their posture betrays. There — very still, in the grey that costs more than colour — Servilia. Antonia has seen her perhaps a dozen times in twenty years, always at this distance, which is the distance Rome keeps between the women in its arrangements: close enough to evaluate, too far to require a greeting. Servilia's veil is arranged as if by engineers. She is listening to an older woman — an aunt, an Acilia, somebody with a priesthood in the family — with an attention so complete it must be costing her something, and Antonia, who prices attention professionally, thinks: that is a woman being told the cost of a marriage. It takes one to itemise one.

She does not permit the thought a second sentence. Servilia is filed, has been filed for nineteen years, under the settlement, and Antonia does not open other women's files in public; she has a house that lives by the principle.

The crowd has its own weather. It thickens toward the imperial party, thins at the altars where the smoke will be, eddies around a man selling, with an entrepreneur's instinct for a captive Senate, little clay columns no taller than a thumb, already spiralled, already triumphant. A child is crying somewhere in the particular key that carries. A legionary veteran on a crutch is being helped, by two strangers and a third man's elbow, up onto a plinth for a better view, and the crowd makes that small, satisfied noise cities make when they have done a decency within sight of each other. Somewhere a rope gives way at a barrier and there is a surge and a counter-surge and a voice raised in official Latin, and a pickpocket — Antonia watches his whole career: the drift, the gather, the repaired innocence of the hands — decides, feeling Barbatus's attention from twenty paces like weather on his neck, to become a spectator instead. Barbatus is not beside her today; Barbatus is never beside her at dedications, it would be a statement, and statements are for clients. But a man who has worked a door for eleven years radiates. She has seen his attention work from across a courtyard full of wine. A Forum is merely a courtyard with an emperor in it.

“What do you suppose it cost?” Eirene asks, meaning the whole thing: forum, basilica, libraries, the column still in its scaffold of timber like a tree not yet allowed to be stone.

“The Dacians,” Antonia says. “Personally. That is the official answer and for once it is also the accounts. Gold in the mountains, men in the mines, marble in Rome.” She watches a team of oxen, garlanded to the edge of dignity, being walked in a wide, patient circuit to keep them calm before the sacrifice. Their hides shine. Handlers talk to them in the low, continuous murmur men use for animals they respect and intend to kill, a tone not unknown in the Senate. “Everything here has been somewhere else first, Eirene. That's the dedication they're actually performing.”

“You should write speeches.”

“I should charge for them. Septimius — your wife's sleeve is better dyed than the priest's border, and if you tell her I said so she will charge you for the compliment in kind.”

She says it because Septimius' wife has taken her hands out of her sleeves to settle her veil and the purple under her nails is the deep, true, sea-snail purple that money cannot quite buy and work cannot wash out. The woman hears. Under the veil something changes — not a smile, which would need witnesses; an acknowledgement, tradeswoman to tradeswoman across a dyer's husband, that the hands have been seen and priced correctly. It is the kind of transaction Antonia values: exact, unrecorded, impossible to tax. Rome runs on them underneath everything it inscribes.

Now the procession of office is forming on the far side: lictors, priests, the colleges in their order, boys with incense swinging their arms wide the way boys have swung incense since Romulus, half devotion, half showing off. The emperor is visible for whole seconds at a time between shoulders: a soldier's head, grey now, the famous plainness of dress that costs more to maintain than purple, since it must never look maintained. Antonia has fed half the men walking behind him. She catalogues them without appetite: who is up, who is being carried by his wife's money, who has begun, in the last year, to have his dinners at home and his truths told by others, which is the first symptom. Power in Rome is mostly this, she thinks again — and then the crowd shifts, in that organic, prescient way it has, a lane beginning to open before the reason for it is visible, the way water finds out about the stone before the stone arrives.

It opens, inevitably, not far from her. Senators in their broad stripes. A priest with his cap tied under his chin. And Lentulus, in the fold and fall of wool that costs more than a good horse, listening to the emperor with his head inclined at the angle that, in their youth — she puts the thought down, hard, like a cup that might spill — that men of his family are taught before they are taught Greek. He is forty-five. There is grey now at his temples that the barber cannot shave away. It suits him, which she notes as she would note a competitor's new cook: professionally, and with resentment held at a distance where it can be of use.

He sees her. Of course he sees her. Twenty years of not speaking in public requires a highly developed awareness of where the other person is standing.

Neither of them inclines a head. The crowd shifts. A child on his father's shoulders points at the equestrian statue and shrieks with the pure, unpatronised joy of a person who does not yet know what anything costs. Somewhere a trumpet tests the air and the pigeons rise off the new marble in a single grey applause.

Eirene says, very quietly, “The embroiderer is still at the house. She asked whether the mistress pays by the piece or by the day, and when Diomedes said by the piece she said, good, because her days belong to her father. I liked her for it.”

“Pay her by the piece,” Antonia says, still looking at the Forum, at the lane closing now behind the senators. “And then add a day's wage, and write it in the book as thread. If her days belong to her father, we will not be the ones to inform him that her work is worth more than he thinks. Let her tell him herself, when she is ready.”

She turns before the sacrifices begin. She has a house to run, an inspection to outlive, and a long-practised conviction that the gods, like senators, prefer to be addressed by people who have first attended to their drains.

Chapter Two

Registrations

. . .

The inspector arrives at the hour when respectable houses are still receiving clients and houses like hers are changing the flowers. He is a man in his thirties with a clerk and a measuring rod and the careful blankness of someone who has been told, by a person who outranks him, that this inspection matters, and told, by a person who pays him, that it would be a shame if it mattered too much. Antonia receives him in the small dining room, not the great one. She has learned to size a room to a man's self-regard: too large and he must fill it, too small and he must escape it.

“You keep a lodging house,” he says, “with dining.”

“I keep a house,” she says, “where men of business may dine in private and hear music. The registrations are there.” Diomedes lays them out like a hand of cards he expects to win with: names, fees, the tax paid quarterly and stamped, the licence for the sale of wine, the lease of the premises from an owner in Ostia who has never, in eleven years, inquired what music is playing so long as the rent arrives before the Kalends.

The inspector runs a finger down the column of women's names. Each name is a legal condition before it is a person: freedwoman, freeborn, citizen, alien. Each has a fee against it. Rome taxes what it condemns with an efficiency it brings to few of its virtues, and Antonia pays the tax on the day, in full, in coin that rings. She has always paid. A woman in her position who cheats the treasury is a story; a woman who overpays it slightly, through rounding, is a footnote, and footnotes survive.

“And this one?” The finger stops. “Daphne. No family name.”

“Daphne, freedwoman of Gaius Antonius, manumitted three years ago before witnesses whose names Diomedes can supply. She sings. She also plays the lyre indifferently, which we do not register, out of kindness.”

The clerk writes. The rod measures a doorway and finds it a doorway. In the corridor, one of the kitchen boys drops a tray and the crash arrives in the small dining room as a useful reminder that this is a working house and not a proposition. The inspector, to his credit, does not flinch. He is looking, Antonia sees, for the thing he has been sent to find, and beginning to understand that if it exists it will not be written in the book she keeps for inspectors, nor in the second book either — the one Diomedes keeps for her — but in the third accounting, which is her memory, and which does not admit measuring rods.

“The premises, then,” the inspector says, in the tone of a man moving to evidence he can measure, and Antonia rises and gives him the house the way she gives a new guest the menu: in full, in order, with nothing saved for a second, more expensive telling. Diomedes walks a pace behind with the tablets. The clerk, who is younger than the rod he carries and in love, as clerks are, with the prospect of scandal in good rooms, walks a pace behind Diomedes with his eyes drinking.

They begin, at Antonia's direction, in the kitchen, which is not where an inspector of morals expects to begin, and is therefore exactly where she begins them all: landlords, tax men, a praetor's steward two years ago with a warrant he eventually used as a napkin. A kitchen argues. Hers argues in copper — pans scoured to mirrors, the new stove drawing cleanly, Ammonius enthroned among his fires with a ladle in his hand and an expression that suggests the aediles may inspect his saucepans when they have published their own. The stores are chalked and dated. The wine cellar book matches the seals. The inspector, who has inspected the kitchens of the Subura and does not speak of them the way veterans do not speak, lets his clerk write stores in order with a hand that has had, Antonia guesses, little practice at the phrase.

“The women eat from the same kitchen?” he asks.

“The women eat first from the same kitchen, before the guests are admitted. A house rule.” She does not offer the reason. The reason is twenty years old and lives in Baiae, in a house where the staff ate what was left and learnt their value from the leavings. “You may ask them. It is permitted to ask them anything that is written in your commission.”

He asks Philomela, because Philomela is in the corridor with a lyre and the air of a woman it would be a clerical error to overlook. Philomela is twenty-six, freeborn in Corinth, professionally a singer in the way generals are professionally soldiers: it explains her rank in any room she enters. She gives the inspector her registration particulars the way she gives a difficult interval — precisely, and with a faint suggestion that lesser instruments exist. Age. Status. The name of the agent who brought her to Rome, a man whose contract Antonia bought out in the first month and burnt in this kitchen's predecessor, a ceremony Philomela attended with a cup of the house's second-best wine, not the best, she still says, she's not sentimental, our mistress; she filed it under fuel.

“Are you content in this house?” the inspector asks. It is not in his commission. It escapes him the way questions do in clean kitchens.

“Officer,” Philomela says, “I am a singer. Contentment is for audiences.” She tunes a string; the note goes through the corridor like a wire through cheese. “I am paid, I am registered, I sing what I choose and I refuse what I don't, and when my voice goes — voices go, officer, write that down too — I have money with a Greek at the Basilica that no husband, patron or tax farmer has the address of. If that is contentment in your Latin, then I am content. In mine it is called not being a fool, which my mother taught me in Corinth at her usual rates.”

The clerk writes nothing. There is no column for it. Antonia watches the inspector decide — she can see him do it, the way you can see a man at her tables decide not to say the true thing over the fish — to make the rest of the inspection be about doors.

So doors it is: widths, hinges, the number of dining rooms and their disposition, the little courtyard room where linen is kept and needlewomen are given the light, the bedrooms upstairs that are, for the register, resting rooms for artists, and are in fact whatever paying adults have agreed between themselves behind them, under house rules the inspector has not been commissioned to imagine. He measures. The rod reports that the house is the size it is. In the great dining room the new hanging stops him — not its beauty, though Eirene, passing with flowers, notes him registering that too and tells the kitchen later — its border. A man whose trade is paper looks at two hundred small red flowers, each one stitched, each one paid for, and has for a moment the expression of a person who has wandered out of his commission into the actual economy.

“From Transtiberim,” Antonia says. “A fuller's daughter. The house commissions its cloth work across the river. Better light, better prices, better women. You may record the neighbourhood as a moral influence, if the form has room.”

“The form,” the inspector says, surprising himself into honesty, which clean kitchens will do, “has very little room, madam. It was designed by men who expected smaller facts.”

They return to the small dining room by way of the courtyard, where the damp map is drying in a bar of sun and the roses are looking, as they always look in this house, handsomely overwatered, like guests who will not be refused a third cup. Barbatus is at the street door admitting a delivery of lamp oil, checking seals with thumbs the size of small hammers. The inspector looks at him and looks away — not fear; a kind of professional reassessment, as of a wall discovered to be structural.

“Your doorkeeper is ex-arena.”

“My doorkeeper is ex-everything Rome could charge admission for. He has killed no one on these premises, which is more than the Senate can say of its foreign policy, and he breaks up fights by standing up. The house recommends the technique to the committee.”

It is more than she usually gives an official, and she gives it deliberately, because a man who has been honest about his form deserves a sentence he can carry back like a souvenir. He almost smiles — the same almost-smile the house will see again from the prefect's man in the spring, though neither of them knows it yet — and sits down to his tablets and his watered wine with the air of a soldier returning to a frontier he suspects of being quieter than Rome.

“There have been complaints,” he says at last. “Noise. Congregation. Men of senatorial rank seen leaving after the second watch.”

“Men of senatorial rank leave the Senate after dark too, in the winter. I believe the streets survive it.” She pours him watered wine herself, which is a courtesy and also a way of ending a sentence. “Record the complaint. Record also that the neighbours on either side are a fuller's workshop and a dealer in lamps, neither of whom you will find among the complainants, because I pay the fuller well and the lamp-seller's daughter was married from this house with a dowry I do not discuss. If the committee wants complainants, it will have to import them, like the marble in the emperor's forum. It can be done. Everything can be done. I merely note the cost of transport.”

He looks at her then, directly, with something that is not quite respect and not quite warning. “The proposal comes from a name that does not lose, madam.”

“All names lose,” Antonia says. “The trick is to lose at something that does not end you. Show him the kitchen, Diomedes. Let him see the new stove. Men who have seen a kitchen find it harder to describe a house as a den. A den does not usually have a pastry cook from Alexandria arguing about saffron.”

When he has gone — rod, clerk, and a report already composing itself in his head in the passive voice, that great laundry of Roman administration, in which things are found and are noted and nobody in particular has ever found or noted them — the house exhales in a way it would deny doing. Ammonius sends up, unasked, a plate of the almond cakes that are reserved for officials and emergencies. Eirene takes one and eats it standing, which in Eirene is a parade.

“Well,” she says. “We are a den with a pastry cook. It is entered in the record.”

Diomedes is already writing the visit into the second book, in the hand he keeps for facts that must survive fashion. “He asked about Daphne's manumission twice,” he says, without looking up. “Once for the form. Once —” the stylus pauses, a toll-gate “— for the person who will read the form and ask him why he asked once. Somebody gave him her name before he came, madam. Not the register. A name, carried separately, like a stone in a sling.”

Antonia is still for a moment in the small dining room, where the inspector's cup sits with a finger's width of watered wine unevaporated at the bottom. She picks it up herself; a slave appears out of the house's well-trained air and, reading her face, decides to be needed in the corridor instead. “Whose stone?”

“The aedile's office would say the committee's. The committee would say the clerk's error.” Diomedes blots a line with the edge of his thumb, an Alexandrian trick he has never explained and she has never asked him to, it being house policy to let competent men keep one mystery each. “I have noted the hour he asked, and the hour he asked again. If a name travels, madam, it leaves footprints in other people's paperwork. You taught me that. In Naples, I believe, over a landlord.”

“I teach a great deal over landlords. It is my university.” She sets the cup down in its ring — she notices herself doing it and thinks of another house, a shrine room, a wife's hands, and files the thought where she files all thoughts with that address: between quarters, unopened. “Daphne is to be told her name was carried. Not frightened. Told. In this house nobody is protected by being uninformed; I have seen the other system work and it ends in Baiae.”

Eirene, who has finished the cake, says, “She'll want to sing about it.”

“She can sing about it in Greek, for people who know.” Antonia moves to the window. The street below is doing its noon business — a water-seller, a pair of advocates sharing a joke at a client's expense, a child herding three geese with a seriousness the Senate might study — all of it entirely uninformed that it has been represented this morning, on paper, as a neighbourhood suffering from congregation and noise. “Congregation,” she says aloud. “They have inspected a dining house and discovered dining. Lentulus must be beside himself with the quality of his intelligence.”

“Careful,” Eirene says, mildly. “That's almost a compliment to his organisation.”

“It is a compliment to his father.” The street, the geese, the advocates. “The old man could settle a province with a steward and a sealed tablet. The son sends a man with a rod to find a kitchen and is surprised by soup. Families decline, Eirene. It is the one inheritance tax nobody evades.”

Diomedes closes the book. “Shall I reply to the aediles' office today?”

“You shall reply on the third day, in the first hand, thanking them for their diligence and enclosing a copy of the tax receipts they already possess. Nothing discourages an office like being thanked with its own paperwork.” She turns from the window. The house is reassembling itself around her for the evening — she can hear the day shift handing over to the night one in a murmur of keys and menus — and her face, which has worn the inspection since the third hour like a good coat, puts it down somewhere the staff will not have to look at it. “And Diomedes. The next time a name arrives here carried separately, I want the name of the carrier. Buy it the way we buy thread.”

“By the piece,” Diomedes says, “and without informing their fathers,” and goes out to spend her money in the invisible denominations.

Registration, in Diomedes opinion, is a form of theatre in which the actors are forbidden to know the plot but required to sign for the scenery. He returns from the office with three new interpretations of one old category and a clerk’s opinion that related by commission may, in time, acquire the dignity of a provincial cult.

“Can a category become respectable by being boring?” Eirene asks.

“It is the principal route,” Diomedes says. “Ask marriage.”

Antonia is reviewing the house schedule while Prima, in the next room at that stage of acquaintance, counts stitches aloud in a way that makes privacy difficult for arithmetic. The counting crosses the doorway in small exact numbers. Antonia does not listen as a woman listens; she listens as a banker respects noise from a mint.

“This one wants her name written as the guild writes it,” Diomedes says, indicating a line. “The office prefers her father’s formulation.”

“Then the office may make an appointment with her father’s ghost and come back in writing.”

“The system is not designed for tradeswomen with opinions on spelling.”

“The system is not designed for weather either, Diomedes. It survives by getting wet.”

A banker’s runner arrives with a request to see the Greek’s receipt, then thinks better of it under Barbatus gaze and asks for water instead. Eirene gives him water and a small cake—administrative routine in this house for men who might otherwise become information. He leaves saying the establishment is “very filed”, a compliment Diomedes receives like land.

Later, when the day’s papers have been shut away into their hierarchy of rooms, Antonia walks the courtyard and listens to the house settling into its evening ratio: kitchen, music, water, linen. It is a city in one address. Rome outside is engaged in ruling the known world by means of inscriptions and appointments. Rome inside, at its better rates, is engaged in knowing precisely where things are kept.

“Do you think we are safe?” Eirene asks, in the voice she uses for people rather than ledgers.

“We are legible.”

“Love, you say that as if it were better.”

“It is safer than being interesting in other people’s handwriting.”

From the linen room comes the small uninterrupted sound of counting, then a pause, then the number corrected. Antonia’s hand, unbidden, finds a wall and finds it dry enough for a different season of the year.

■

Lentulus hears the report in a room off the Basilica where the light falls in tall, dusty slabs and every conversation sounds as if it were already being transcribed by history. The aedile's man is apologetic in the way of officials who have found nothing and must make nothing sound like diligence. Registrations in order. Tax paid. Lease valid. Women of legal age and status, each accounted for. No unregistered slaves found on the premises. The house is, on paper, a dining establishment of unusual cleanliness.

"On paper," Lentulus repeats.

"On paper, senator, half of Rome is a temple."

It is a good line and the man knows it and regrets it in the same breath. Lentulus lets it pass. He has the colder problem of having aimed a public instrument at a private target and struck, with great precision, her paperwork — which she will now certainly have framed by the sheer force of having survived him.

Postumus, who has attached himself to the meeting in the manner of a relative who considers proximity a form of counsel, says when they are alone, "You knew she'd be clean. She was always clean. Even when —" He stops, with the belated tact of a man who has drunk at too many tables where the past was served as a side dish.

"Even when," Lentulus says pleasantly, "is not a period of history the Senate recognises. What do the banks say?"

Postumus brightens. Money is a country where his accent is native. "Her money is not where you'd think. Some in property through freedmen, some in loans through a Greek at the Basilica — very respectable Greek, the kind other Greeks call Roman when they want to insult him. She lends like a senator and collects like a landlord." He hesitates. "There is a rumour she holds paper on half the young men who dine there. Debts of honour, settled into debts of record. Quietly."

“Paper on whom, exactly?”

“Exactly is expensive. Approximately is free. Approximately: everyone you would not want named in a committee.” Postumus watches him. “Old friend. If this is policy, it is bad policy, because she is cleaner than the policy. If it is not policy, it is worse, because she will know the difference even if the Senate pretends not to.”

Outside, the Forum crowd of the previous day has thinned into litigants and money-changers and the perpetual float of men waiting to be noticed by other men. Lentulus stands a moment under the portico and does an unfamiliar thing: he considers what he is doing as someone else might witness it. A man of ancient family, a former consul, a candidate in all but announcement for the Syrian command that will precede the emperor's eastern war, devoting the first weeks of the year to the registrations of a dining house on the Caelian. There are explanations a hostile world could supply. There is the explanation he supplies himself at hours when supply is low: that the city is rotting at its pleasures, that young men of good family are mortgaging estates to freedwomen's bankers, that someone whose name still means something must be seen to mean it.

The explanations hold together like a speech. They have that in common with speeches: they work best aloud, to others.

He walks home instead of taking the chair, which his household will hear about as a philosophy. The streets between the Basilica and the Palatine are full of the dedication's second day: workmen dismantling barriers, priests' boys reliving processions with sticks, a stallholder repainting his sign to include the word imperial in a hand that gets less certain toward the expensive letters. A client of his father's time, now very old and carried by a grandson who is visibly charging the whole transaction to his inheritance, recognises Lentulus and raises a hand like a standard being unfurled for the last time. Lentulus stops. This is also the work. Names are exchanged; a grandson is blessed in the formula; an old man is assured, in public, at a volume that recruits witnesses, that the Cornelii remember.

It costs four minutes and the price of a small farm in the currency his wife manages. Walking on, Lentulus does the sum he has been refusing since the portico: the committee's true arithmetic. For the registry to be policy, it must cost his friends something and be seen to. For it to be revenge, it must cost one woman everything and be deniable. A measure cannot be both at the full rate; Rome, which runs two sets of books as a civilisation — Greek and Latin libraries facing each other across the emperor's courtyard, each convinced it is the original — will ask him, in the baths, in the toilets, in the terrible clarity of other men's jokes, which book he is keeping. He has been telling himself the answer in committee language for a month. The language is holding together like a speech, and a speech, as his grandfather used to say while the masks were still being made of men he had known personally, is just a wall that has decided to be admired instead of climbed.

At the house the door slave takes his cloak and the day off him in the same motion. Servilia, from the garden room, calls — without raising her voice; the house is built so that she never has to — that the Acilii have sent fish, that his son is out, that his daughter has sung the Greek one, once, to the music master only, a distinction the girl has negotiated like a harbour due. Lentulus stands a moment in his own hall being reported to like a province. Everything is in order. That is the intelligence his committee has produced, on every front, all week: order, itemised, at other people's addresses.

■

The embroiderer comes again on the third day, because Antonia, having seen the hanging up in the great dining room, has sent word that the border wants another row of the small red flowers whose name she does not know, and that the house will pay for the thread separately. The girl — no, Antonia corrects herself, the young woman; she dislikes in herself the diminishing word she hears all day from men — arrives with her work-box and her father's permission written in her posture, shoulders squared against a rebuke for being in such a house at all.

“You may work in the courtyard,” Antonia says. “The light is better and Barbatus will frighten away anyone who thinks a woman sewing is a woman waiting to be spoken to.”

“My father says I am not to eat here.”

“Your father is protecting your reputation from my kitchen. Very well. You will not eat. You will, however, drink, because I will not have a needlewoman faint among my roses and give the aediles a second report to write.”

A smile escapes the young woman and is retrieved, but not fast enough to be unseen. She has a narrow face, dark brows, hands that know their trade so thoroughly the needle seems to be remembering rather than deciding. Her name, entered by Diomedes in the day-book under Payments to Trades, is Vibia Prima. Nineteen. Daughter of a freedman fuller in Transtiberim and a wife who died two winters ago. Betrothed, Eirene has already discovered — Eirene can discover a betrothal through a closed door; it is her one vulgar talent — to a baker's son with a shop near the Trigarium and a mother who inspects Prima's hems as if they were character references.

Prima's day, when she has a commission on the right bank, begins before the vats are lit, in a room that smells of yesterday's work whatever she does about it. This is not a complaint. Prima's relationship to smell is professional and, in its way, loyal: fullers' earth is honest, stale urine is merely chemistry with a history, and a clean garment coming off the frames has a smell she would put, in any honest census of Rome's perfumes, above rose oil bought to impress other people's wives. She heats her father's honey drink before she washes, because his cough is worst at the day's cold hinge and because if she washes first he will get up to do it himself, out of a doctrine — learned across a marriage and now carried alone like a hod — that a man who lets a house wake around him in bed is being buried by instalments.

“You're a garrison of one,” she tells him.

“I'm a fuller,” Vibius says. “We rise so Rome can pretend it was always clean.”

He drinks. She combs her hair at the window where the light comes in off the yard — grey light, working light, nothing like the Caelian courtyard's bar of sun, and she catches herself making the comparison and is annoyed at her own treachery. The comparison is new. It has come with the commission. She has sewn for good houses before — a priest's widow on the Aventine whose hems Prima still dreams about, badly; a contractor's wife who paid in compliments and festival cakes — but the Caelian house is the first place that has ever paid her in a way that made her father's face do that thing over the soup. Itemised. The mistress across the river writes Prima's work down the way the guild writes a master's: by the piece, the thread separate, the sum at the bottom with a line under it. Prima has been an entry in other people's books before, usually under her father's name, as daughter, sewing. Under her own name she is taller. She knows this is paperwork and she knows it is not only paperwork, and she is savage with herself, combing, for being the kind of girl — woman, the mistress would say; the mistress corrects words the way Prima corrects seams, in passing, without permission — who can be bought with bookkeeping.

Her betrothed's mother has no such doubts, only different ones. On the stairs of the insula, where she stations herself on market mornings with the tactical instinct of a customs post, she receives Prima's news of a third day's work on the Caelian with a stillness you could hang cloth on.

“Three days for a border.”

“Two hundred flowers, Mother Livia. I counted them to the mistress. She pays by the piece.”

“She pays.” The older woman's eyes go, as they always go, to Prima's hands, her hem, the place where a reputation would show wear if reputations were garments — and to Mother Livia, who has raised four sons on bread and inspection, they are exactly garments. “A house like that pays everyone at the door, so the street can see. It's what happens off the street that gets into the cloth."

"Then I shall stay on the street side of the courtyard," Prima says, "where the light is, with the doorkeeper, who frightens the customers for a living. He is very respectable, Mother Livia. He has killed people in the arena for the emperor's grandfather and now he checks lamp oil. Rome promotes."

It earns her, after a moment in which the customs post considers a seizure, a snort that in another woman would be a laugh. "You read too much."

"I read Titus' accounts when his sums won't. Tell him his yeast man's bill is wrong by eleven sesterces in the yeast man's favour, which is the direction bills are usually wrong in. It's in the second column. He doesn't check second columns because the first one is his."

This is Prima's armour and she knows it: usefulness, laid on thick as fuller's earth. A reading bride is a defect; a bride who finds eleven sesterces in a second column is a dowry with eyes. She goes down the stairs, with her work-box clutched against her ribs, rehearsing the ferry money — two coins for the boat if the bridge crowd is bad, one if she walks by the island and the water is low — and by the time she reaches the river the morning has become the kind of Roman morning that makes foreigners write letters home: light on the water, gulls from the sea quarrelling over the offal boats, the hills of the right bank standing up out of woodsmoke with their temples and tenements indistinguishable at this distance, which is the city's best angle and it knows it.

She walks. Prima always walks when the choice is hers; the ferry is full of men making room in ways that require management, and she prefers to spend management on thread. The island bridge, with its temple and its hospital slaves being aired like bedding on the parapet; the cattle market smelling of the beginning of dinner; the long climb through streets that change their prices every hundred paces. She likes the climb. She likes — she has never said this, she files it under things a fuller's daughter need not say — arriving at the Caelian house slightly out of breath, as if at the top of a sentence. Inside, the porter gives her the small room off the courtyard and a stool with its back to the traffic, by the mistress's instruction, and Barbatus, who frightens customers for a living, moves his own stool six feet without being asked, so that his shadow falls between her and the dining rooms. She has a fuller father's understanding of what is being laundered here. Her reputation is being washed in advance, by experts, at a cost somebody is itemising as thread.

She sets the frame. She counts, chin tucked, mouth open on the number. The red flowers have a rhythm like a work-song and she goes into it the way the men in the vats go into the treading, not thinking, in the approved manner, at all — which is when, as every needlewoman and fuller and soldier knows, the thinking arrives that has been waiting its turn. Today it is her mother's voice, two years dead and clearer than the living: count the stairs, so the stairs don't count you. Ninety, in Baiae. Prima has seen the sea once, from Ostia, on a guild outing that cost her father a week's coughing; Baiae lives in her head as a staircase standing in blue light, with her mother on it, young, carrying linen, counting. She does not know why the mistress of this house went quiet — the way rich women go quiet at a price, she told her father, and he had held his blanket like a rail and not answered — when Prima passed on the stairs saying. Perhaps the mistress has been to Baiae. Rich women go to Baiae the way other people's linen goes to the fullers: regularly, and to be improved. Perhaps the mistress once had a laundress.

The needle goes in. The needle comes out. Somewhere beyond the courtyard a singer is practising, running a phrase up a staircase of notes and down again, counting, counting, and Prima — who does not eat in this house, whose father has protected her reputation from its kitchen, who will drink water in a moment from the mistress's own hand because the mistress will not have a needlewoman faint among her roses — feels, without any language for it that her street would accept, that she is being watched the way work is watched by someone who has done it.

Not the customers' watching. A tradeswoman's. It straightens her back without her permission. She sews the next flower as if it were evidence.

Antonia watches her work a moment longer than supervision requires. There is a way the girl holds her head when she is counting stitches, chin tucked, mouth slightly open on the number, that plucks at something in Antonia which she files, with the swiftness of long practice, under the general sorrow of watching the young be young in a city that charges for it. She goes back to her accounts.

She does not notice — because she is a woman who notices prices, exits and the weather in a man's voice, and no one notices everything — the small, pale mark on the inside of Prima's left wrist, shaped, if a person were fanciful, like a half-closed eye. The needle goes in. The needle comes out. The red flowers multiply along the border, each one the same, each one, if you look closely, which Prima's future mother-in-law certainly will, very slightly alive with difference.

Chapter Three

Clients in the Morning

. . .

A great house in Rome begins the day by being besieged politely. From first light the atrium fills: clients in clean togas they cannot afford to clean often, freedmen with petitions folded to the size of embarrassment, a poet with an epic in a bucket, two cousins from Arpinum who believe the Cornelii owe their grandfather a magistracy. Servilia moves among the preparations like a quartermaster who has read the campaign plan and found it sentimental. Lentulus receives, remembers names, distinguishes the man who needs a loan from the man who needs the mention of a loan in front of witnesses, and keeps, beneath the surface of the morning, a steady count of what each greeting will cost and in what currency it can be repaid.

It is not cynicism. Or rather, he would say, it is not only cynicism. Patronage is the city's true aqueduct: favour flows downhill, obligation climbs back up, and everyone is wet. His father taught him to receive clients standing, so that no man could say the Cornelii sat while Rome asked. His father also taught him — not in words; in the disposition of estates, in marriages proposed over maps — that a family survives by converting land into loyalty and loyalty back into land before either currency fails.

The first client is the poet, because poets are always first, having the least to do after. He is called Quintus Valerius Soranus, after three men who would have paid to stop him, and he carries his epic in a bucket because the book-boxes are full — twelve books on the Dacian wars, in which the emperor appears, by the poet's own proud census, two hundred and forty times, and the Cornelii, by a creative interpretation of the campaign rolls, four. He does not want money, which is the first thing poets say in atria. He wants the work heard by a person whose hearing signifies, which is money in a laurel wreath. Lentulus hears the proem standing, as he hears everything at this hour, and finds, to his own mild disgust, that it is not contemptible. The man can do a river crossing. Rivers are his metre's home address.

“The passage where the bridge goes over at night,” Lentulus says. “Cut the catalogue of timbers by half.”

Soranus clutches the bucket like a hostage. “The timbers are documentary.”

“So is a tax return. We do not recite them at dinner.” Lentulus takes, from the tray his steward holds at the correct angle of invisibility, a small purse that the household prepares each morning in three sizes — Servilia calls them encouragement, dismissal, and danger — and gives the poet the middle one. “Read the bridge, and only the bridge, at Acilius' next evening. I will see that you are invited. If Acilius' guests are still awake at the far bank, we will discuss the remaining eleven books.”

The poet bows so low the bucket tips. Somewhere in the arithmetic of patronage a bridge has just been funded, and a poet's winter, and a small lien placed on the memory of the Dacian wars, where the Cornelii now appear four times, by purchase. This is how history is made in Rome before it is carved. The carving comes later, when the embarrassing parts have been paid for and can be omitted respectably.

The second client is not one man but a delegation: three freedmen of a Cornelian grain depot at Ostia, come up to Rome with a lawsuit in one satchel and, in another, smoked fish for the household, which Servilia's steward accepts with the gravity due to tribute between nations. Their case is a warehouse boundary, a neighbour's wall, a measurement disputed to the width of a man's hand — matters on which, as Lentulus listens, some hundreds of people's dinners actually depend, though no epic will ever spend a river on them. He asks the one question their advocate has evidently forbidden them to answer — who owns the wall's other side — and watches them decide, in a three-way flicker of eyes, to trust the atrium instead.

“The Avidii,” says the eldest, in the voice of a man confessing weather. “The new depot. Since the autumn.”

Lentulus looks at the wax masks, who look back with three centuries of practice at receiving this kind of news before breakfast. His daughter's possible marriage has just acquired a party wall. Rome is a village with aqueducts; he has known it since he was twenty and it has never once been convenient.

“You will not sue,” he says. “You will survey — a surveyor of my choosing, paid from this house, so that his findings are a favour and not a missile — and the Avidii will be shown his rods at a dinner, not a tribunal. A hand's width, gentlemen, is a negotiating instrument. In court it becomes a principle, and principles eat warehouses.”

They bow over the solution, relieved in the way of men who came for a war and are being given a boundary stone and a hot breakfast. The steward moves them toward the kitchens. On their way out they pass the two cousins from Arpinum, standing in togas of a whiteness that argues long storage and short funds, rehearsing, without moving their lips, the case that the Cornelii owe their grandfather a magistracy. Lentulus can see the case's whole future from where he stands: ten minutes of genealogy, produced like a sword from a walking stick; his own reply, in the formula his father used — the family's gratitude is a matter of record — which is Latin for a door; and then Servilia, later, telling him the Arpinum cousins have a cousin of their own in the harbour dues office, and that gratitude ought therefore to be put on the record in a more spendable denomination. She will be right. She is the quartermaster of gratitude. He merely issues it at parades.

Between clients, in the breath the atrium takes, he is aware of the household performing the morning as his wife has scored it: the door slave admitting no one whose name the steward has not tasted first; the boy with the guest-towels; the clerk at the side table writing, in a book that is the family's true epic, who came, what they asked, what they were given, what it will cost when it comes back — and everything comes back; that is the aqueduct. Cornelia crosses the far end of the atrium on her way to her lesson with her scroll held like something she is rescuing rather than carrying, and does not look at the clients, who must not be given a daughter to look at in business hours; the rule is Servilia's, older than the girl, part of the house's fortifications. Lentulus watches his daughter not look at his morning and feels, obscurely, audited.

A veteran is waiting too, further back, in the place men put themselves when they have been clients before and know the tariff of patience. He has Moesia in his face and one hand that the years since have taught to do the work of the other one. Lentulus served — served is the household word; his own, privately, is attended — with the man's legion in a winter he does not recount at dinners. He will keep the veteran last, because what the man needs is not a purse-size but a recommendation to a land commission, which takes the time it takes, and because the Arpinum cousins must be seen to be received before the veteran is seen to matter more than they do, which everyone in the atrium already knows and the order of the morning must conspire not to say. Patronage, he thinks, for the thousandth time, in the exact tone of a man reading his own inscription as someone else carves it: it is not a system for distributing help. It is a system for distributing the appearance of help in an order nobody can afford to dispute. His father would have called that a provincial sentiment too, and then received his clients in the same order, standing, for fifty years.

The man from the Campanian agent is third, and he is the morning's true weather. The harvest loans have been rolled over twice. The interest, compounded through a banker whose name Lentulus prefers not to write in his own hand, now stands against the olive groves above Capua and, behind a veil of legal Latin, against the house on the Palatine itself.

“How long?” Lentulus asks.

“The banker is patient, dominus.”

“Bankers are patient the way rivers are patient. I asked how long.”

“Until the autumn, certainly. Beyond the autumn he will want a payment that signifies intention.”

“A payment always signifies intention. That is its function.”

The agent bows over the blow and withdraws to be given breakfast by a household that feeds its creditors' messengers better than some families feed their sons, because hunger talks.

Servilia, when the atrium has thinned, says, “Cornelia has been asked to sing at the house of the Acilii. She will go, she will sing one song, she will not sing the Greek one. Her voice is an asset and I will not have it spent like loose change.” Cornelia, sixteen, stands in the doorway of her mother's room with a scroll crushed slightly in one hand, being discussed in the third person in the manner of daughters and provinces. She has learnt — Lentulus sees it and is, obscurely, both proud and sorry — not to let her face bid in an auction she is not permitted to enter.

“And the Avidii?” he asks.

“The Avidii have money from shipping and a son with all his teeth. Their name was made by a man who unloaded grain. In two generations it will be an old name, because their grandchildren will pay historians.” Servilia folds a cloth that does not need folding. “We need money that does not smell of the docks, Lentulus, and we need it without being seen to need it. That is the whole of my position. It has been the whole of my position since the Campanian accounts came home in November, and I notice it becomes no larger for being restated.”

Cornelia says, “May I go to my lesson, Mother?”

“You may. Do not let the music master touch your wrist to correct it. He corrects what does not require correction.”

When the girl has gone, Lentulus says, “You think I should take the Avidii.”

“I think you should know the price of refusing them. You have always known the price of everything except refusal. Refusal you treat as free, because your family has been able to afford it for three hundred years.” She looks toward the atrium, where a slave is sweeping the morning's footprints toward the street door in long, even strokes. “Three hundred years is not a sum of money, husband. It is only a story we tell the money.”

When she has gone, the atrium settles its morning accounts without her: clients to the street, breakfast to the clients who missed it standing, the clerk's book to the steward, the steward to the kitchens with the day's small change of favour itemised into meals. Lentulus dictates letters in his study with the windows open to the winter garden, where nothing is flowering and everything is being cut back by a gardener who conducts pruning as a branch of political theory. To the Campanian agent: patience, arrangements, the vintage invoked like a god with a good memory. To a fellow senator whose vote he needs on the harbour dues and whose son he has just, at ruinous expense of dignity, praised in the Senate toilets — the true committee rooms of Rome, where men stand in a row and tell each other the truth at a fixed distance — a letter of such warmth that his secretary, who is paid to believe dictation, raises an eyebrow he is not paid for.

"Read it back," Lentulus says.

The secretary reads. The warmth, read back, sounds like upholstery.

"Send it," Lentulus says. "Upholstery is what coalitions sit on."

From the far side of the garden comes Cornelia's lyre, and the music master's voice, and the particular silence where a correction by hand would go if this household permitted what half of Rome permits and calls tuition. The master is a Greek of forty with a reputation he keeps bandaged, and Servilia's instruction about the wrist has clearly reorganised his entire method into metaphor: as if the string were a thread, domina; as if the hand were coming home from a journey. Cornelia plays. She plays the figure correctly, and then — Lentulus hears it because a father who has sat through committees develops an ear for the inserted clause — she plays it again with something added, a turn of her own, small and unlicensed and unmistakably hers, and the master's voice, after a pause in which a career is weighed against an ear, says, "Again, domina. The second way."

Lentulus stands at his window with a letter about harbour dues going cold in the secretary's hand and listens to his daughter insert herself, note by note, into music older than the family. He thinks: this is what we are selling to the Avidii, and the word selling, which Marcus used at a dinner table and was rebuked for, stands in his own mind unrebuked, in a locked room, at his usual rates. Not the girl — the form insists, and the form is a kind of truth. The name. The thing the name will do for a shipping family's grandchildren in rooms this girl will decorate with a voice her mother issues like a ration: one song, not the Greek. He thinks of the Greek at the Basilica, in whose quiet office this family's name is presently sitting in a file, being patient like a river. He thinks — the garden, the pruning, the note again, the second way — of the other file, in the cupboard under his grandfather's mask, where a different accounting of his name has been sitting for nine years being patient like something worse than a river. Like a debt in a currency bankers fear to touch.

“Dominus?” the secretary says.

“Nothing. A correction.” Lentulus turns back to the letters. “In the letter to the agent. Where I say the family will make a payment signifying intention — strike signifying intention. Put: the family will pay. If we are to be hauled up our own aqueduct by our creditors, we may as well arrive with clean Latin.”

The secretary, who has written signifying intention for this family for eleven years, strikes it with a stylus stroke so deep it goes through the wax to the wood. Outside, the gardener cuts something back to a knuckle and stands looking at it with the satisfaction of a man who believes, professionally, in return growth. The lyre plays the figure a third time. The second way. It is better. Everyone in earshot of the garden, including the truth, knows it is better.

Morning is when the house performs its most delicate sorting. Night has its reputation, but morning has the information. Diomedes lays the day’s requests out in order of solvency, discretion and the probability that a man’s idea of secrecy involves arriving with three friends and a recognisable cloak. Eirene reads over his shoulder while eating bread, a combination that has prevented more disasters than the city watch.

“This one asks for Daphne exclusively,” she says. “Exclusively. As if she were a hunting dog with ambitions.”

“He means music at his sister’s dinner,” Diomedes says. “The wording is unfortunate.”

“Wording is the whole confession in this town. Send Philomela as well and charge him for harmony. Men behave better when outnumbered by lyrics.”

Antonia, at the other side of the table, is going through a list of clients whose credit requires translation. A grain factor can be trusted to pay after the fleet. A senator’s nephew can be trusted to intend to pay, which is not a currency she accepts. A widow from the Aventine wants a room for six women, music, no men except the one paid to play flute and leave before dessert. Diomedes has marked this request with a star.

“Is she respectable?” Eirene asks.

“She is punctual,” Antonia says. “It is the form respectability should take before lunch.”

“She will want names hypothetical.”

“Then we will give her first names and good water. Rome can survive a number of administrations under those conditions.”

A client arrives before the doors are properly awake. He is not drunk—morning clients have the dignity of business about even their vices—and asks to speak to the mistress about a debt from a deceased friend. It transpires that he wants the debt to die with the friend and the evening’s entertainment to be resurrected at his own table. Antonia hears him out with the expression she reserves for tax receipts and unsatisfactory weather.

“Your friend is dead,” she says. “His account is not. It has relatives.”

“I thought, madam, in the spirit of—”

“My house does not provide spirits.”

Barbatus, in the doorway, becomes the size of a conclusion. The client pays half now and arranges the rest before the next moon, which Eirene calls “a funeral with instalments”. Daphne, passing to rehearsal with her hair still negotiating its terms, hums a phrase so pure it makes the morning office briefly feel underdressed.

“You see?” Antonia tells Diomedes. “Exclusive.”

“Madam, I shall phrase the reply with diplomacy.”

“Phrase it with fees. Diplomacy can harmonise.”

■

Antonia's morning clients are not called clients. They are called the wine merchant wanting a longer credit, the mother of a girl in the Subura who has heard that Antonia pays for midwives without asking whose child it is, the ageing actor who once played kings and now plays, with great dignity, a man asking for the loan of a dining room for his benefit recital. She receives them sitting, because a woman who stands to receive in her own house looks like staff. She receives them quickly, because slowness in others is a tax she declines to pay twice.

Daphne comes last, which is strategy, and not hers alone: Eirene has held her back until Antonia has eaten. Daphne is twenty-two, freed three years, with a voice that makes men believe they have finer feelings than their conduct supports. She is wearing, at an hour when no one is performing anything, a necklace of green stones that Antonia has not seen before.

“Sit down,” Antonia says. “Take it off first. I want to talk to you, not to it.”

Daphne takes it off with the languor she uses on stage when a heroine removes a crown. In her palm the stones look smaller. Most gifts do, Antonia reflects, when they come off the body and into the light of an office.

“He says they are emeralds.”

“He lies professionally or he lies as a hobby?”

“He is a senator's son. It may be both.”

“Marcus Lentulus,” Antonia says. It is not a question, because Diomedes keeps the door-book better than the Senate keeps its minutes.

Daphne, who is not a fool, stops arranging her face. “He hears me sing. He talks about his father the way men talk about weather in a country they mean to emigrate from. He has given me glass stones and a great deal of true information, and I think he believes the exchange was the other way round.”

“What information?”

“That the father means to press the committee. That there is talk of the Syrian appointment and that the father needs to be seen as a man who cleans stables. That the sister is to be sold — his word is married, but he is twenty and drunk on being the only honest man in his family — to shipping money. That the Cornelii owe—” she pauses “—everyone.”

Antonia is very still. In the courtyard someone laughs, a real laugh, the pastry cook's, and a dove answers from the roof tiles with its soft, stupid music. “You will give the necklace back,” she says.

“Antonia—”

“You will give it back with the message that you admired it too much to risk it among musicians. He will understand that he has been caught lying and forgiven beautifully, and he will be yours for another month and truthful for at least a week. Glass accepted is a price agreed, Daphne. I did not free you — I did not pay your former owner a sum I still resent remembering — so that a Lentulus could buy you again wholesale.”

“You say his name,” Daphne says quietly, “the way other people say a street they used to live in.”

“I say it the way I say the tax office. With respect for its power to inconvenience me.” Antonia stands, which ends it. But at the door she stops, because the girl — the young woman, the freedwoman with glass in her palm — is looking at the stones as if they might yet argue their case. “You want things that are real,” Antonia says, more gently. “So did I. The city will offer you a great many shining substitutes and call your refusal ingratitude. Refuse anyway. A real stone can be sold in a bad winter. Remember which of the two you are collecting.”

Daphne stays in the small room when Antonia has gone, with the glass stones cooling in her palm like a story cooling into evidence. She has been free for three years, and freedom, she is learning in instalments, is mostly the right to decide which instructions to be angry about. Antonia's instruction is good. That is what makes it galling. A bad order can be disobeyed with a clear conscience and a song; a good one must be followed in full view of one's own judgment, nodding.

Eirene comes in with the day's flowers for the small room — winter roses, forced and faintly resentful — and looks at the necklace the way she looks at everything expensive and unearned in this house: as a management problem with a clasp.

“He'll bring a real one next time,” Daphne says.

“He'll bring a worse lie and a better dinner story. They learn in that order, those boys; it is a family curriculum.” Eirene sets the flowers down and begins, out of thirty years of habit, to sort them by the life left in them. “I was given a necklace once by a man who owned the house I worked in, the street it stood in and, as the law then filed it, me. Real stones. Wonderful stones. I wore them at his table for two years and when he died his son's steward took them off my neck with a receipt. Household property, he said. He wasn't even unkind. Kindness wasn't in the inventory either.”

Daphne closes her hand over the glass. “Antonia never tells that story.”

“Antonia tells nobody's story, including Antonia's. It is why this house can charge what it charges.” Eirene holds a rose up to the light, finds it acceptable, forgives it. “Give the glass back beautifully, as instructed. Keep the information, as instructed. And when you are my age, Daphne, buy your own stones with money that has your name in a Greek's book, and let some senator's son explain to the room what they are. There is no music like it. I have heard Philomela. I know whereof I speak.”

That night the house fills in its ordinary, extraordinary way: a grain contractor celebrating a contract he cannot yet announce, two equestrians negotiating a partnership over courses designed to slow them down, an elderly advocate who comes for the music and stays, chastely and entirely, for the pleasure of being listened to by women who are paid to find the law interesting and have become, over the years, genuinely formidable on the subject of inheritance. Antonia moves between rooms as she always moves, present everywhere the way a key signature is present in music. She tastes the sauce for the dormice and sends it back. She settles, with four words and a hand on an elbow, a quarrel between cousins over a wager on the races. She notes, without writing, that the grain contractor's partner drinks only water after the fish course, which means he is either ill, devout, or negotiating in earnest — and files it under all three.

Consider the fish. Ammonius does, at the length other men give to mistresses. It has come up from Ostia in wet straw on a mule that is now, by house policy, being fed in the yard at a standard the muleteer describes to the kitchen boy as senatorial. The grain contractor, whose unannounced triumph the evening exists to celebrate without announcing, is a man from Puteoli with a face like a harbour wall and manners he has had built for him by a succession of wives, each better born than the last. He knows fish the way bankers know weather. He tastes Ammonius' sauce — the sauce has been sent back once tonight already, by Antonia, with a message consisting of the word again — and closes his eyes.

“My ships,” he says, “should carry this instead of grain.”

“Your ships,” says his partner, who drinks water after the fish course and is therefore, as Antonia has already filed, negotiating in earnest, “would arrive empty. The crews have votes too.”

It gets the laugh — from the table, from the corner where Philomela is resting between songs with a cup she is not drinking, for the voice — and into the laugh's warmth the partner slides the actual evening: tonnage, winter sailings, a clause about spoilage that has clearly been the subject of a war in somebody's office. Antonia, passing with the unhurried visibility of a hostess who is also the management, hears the clause resolve itself between the fish and the boar, in the presence of witnesses too well fed to be bought cheaply later. This is the house's true menu. Men book her rooms the way they book notaries: so that agreements acquire flavour and cannot afterwards be said to have happened in an atmosphere of duress. She charges for the food. The peace of mind is itemised as music.

The elderly advocate — he is called Mamercus, he is seventy-one, he has outlived two emperors, three wives and the fashion for his best courtroom manner, which was irony before irony was taxed — holds his usual court in the small room, and his court, as usual, is women. Tonight it is Daphne, between songs, and a widow of equestrian family who comes to the house, chaperoned by a freedwoman of ferocious respectability, to hear music her own household calls unsuitable for a mourning that has entered its fourth year and shows signs of being redecorated. Mamercus is explaining, with the patience of a man who has explained it in basilicas for money, why a will made in a fit of gratitude is the most dangerous document in Roman law.

"Gratitude," he says, "is an intoxicant. Worse. Wine wears off by morning and a man may plead it. Gratitude improves overnight, like your mistress's stock, and by the time the witnesses are called he believes he owes his life to a person who has merely returned his seal-ring from a dining-room floor." He looks sideways at Antonia, who is passing and has never, in eleven years, returned anything without first ensuring its owner fully experiences having lost it. "Present company professionally excepted."

"You lost a stylus here in November, Mamercus," Antonia says. "Shall I make a will about it?"

"You returned the stylus with a lecture on the price of ivory. I have left it to my grandson as a moral instrument."

The widow laughs — startles herself with it, checks the freedwoman, finds no tribunal there — and laughs again, properly. Antonia marks it.

There is a tariff of grief in Rome, precisely observed by the women it is levied on and quoted back at them by everyone else, and part of what her house sells, unitemised anywhere, is a room where a respectable widow may discover at seventy — no, at fifty, the widow is fifty and has been filed by her family under furniture — that her laugh still works at its original specification. She will book again. She will bring, in time, a niece. Empires of Antonia's kind are not built on the appetites Rome confesses to in the baths. They are built on the ones it doesn't: to be listened to, to be well fed without owing a marriage for it, to sit in a room where the women are professionally not shocked and the men are contractually not owners, and hear a very old advocate explain inheritance law like a love song.

In the great room the two equestrians have arrived, by way of Ammonius' boar, at the brink of their partnership, and are toasting it in a Falernian whose route to this table — a carter, a lesson, a cellar book — they will never know. One of them waylays Antonia by the serving door with the confidence of a man who believes charm should be volume-discounted.

"We want the big room in April," he says. "For the signing feast. Forty covers. Can the house do forty?"

"The house has done sixty for men who sign bigger," Antonia says. "April is three months away. Rome may fall, your partner may sober up, the price of boar—"

"Then it's booked?"

"It is pencilled," she says, "which in this house means Diomedes has it in wax, and wax, young man, has carried the whole of Roman law for a thousand years. Come in February with a deposit and a list of who must not sit beside whom. That list is the feast. The food is what we serve while the list works."

He laughs, delighted to be handled; men of his age and order pay extra for the sensation, which Antonia's day-book records without comment under room hire, premium. She moves on. The musicians change; Daphne rises to sing, and the room does the thing rooms do for her now, settling with a small, collective adjustment of cushions and standards. She sings a Greek air first, for form, and then a Roman street tune she has slowed down until it sounds like a hymn that has seen things, and the grain contractor — harbour wall, three wives, fleet impounded in a sauce — is seen by Philomela, and reported to the kitchen, to wipe his eyes with the back of his hand and immediately appoint the gesture to the pepper.

This is the second hour's approach. Antonia clocks it by the lamps: the boy has trimmed them once, will trim them again before the steward's hour; the second trimming is her signal to check the door-book and the street, because after it the evening belongs to whoever has stayed, and staying late in her house is a category of person she likes to choose personally. She is at the door-book, with Barbatus' thumb blacking the margin where he has checked a seal, when Diomedes comes up the corridor with the evening's messages on a tray he uses for the purpose — a nice distinction, his, between paper and food, which he maintains the whole of Roman administration fails to. Bills, a booking from a Spaniard with silver interests, a note from a lady whose handwriting Diomedes has placed, correctly, before unfolding it. And underneath, where a man who keeps three books in three hands puts the item a day will be audited by: a folded sheet with no seal at all.

At the second hour of the night Diomedes brings her, among the ordinary messages, a folded note with no seal, in a hand she knows before she opens it the way one knows a step on a stair.

It says: Withdraw the young men and I withdraw the committee. We need not meet to arrange what we both understand.

There is no signature. Lentulus never learned that an unsigned note is still a signature if the handwriting is the one that taught you, at seventeen, how to shape the letter that begins your name.

Antonia holds it a moment over the lamp — not to burn it. She never burns paper that could be evidence or leverage or, on a night when the accounts are done and the house is loud with other people's appetites, company. She folds it once, precisely, and puts it in the box where she keeps the tax receipts, between the quarters.

“Tell the messenger,” she says to Diomedes, “that the house thanks his master for his interest in its guest list, and that the guest list, like the tax receipts, is filed quarterly.”

Diomedes, who has translated her meaning into survival for eleven years, bows and goes to find the exact tone in which a non-answer can be made to sound like a door closing in a well-built house.

Chapter Four

What the Baths Know

. . .

The baths at the eighth hour are Rome with its clothes off and its guard, paradoxically, up. Steam, oil, the slap of feet on wet mosaic, a ball game in the exercise yard conducted with the seriousness of a border dispute. Lentulus goes twice a week and never on the days his son goes, an arrangement both of them maintain without ever having made it. A man's friendships are audited in the baths. So are his enmities; the water carries everything.

Lentulus arrives with his own oil flask, his own strigils in a case his grandfather's campaign chest would recognise, and a slave, Onesimus, whose entire public personality is a talent for standing in the one spot in any room where a senator's conversation cannot be overheard by accident. Onesimus has served in this capacity for eleven years. He has heard, in that time, three treasons discussed as hypotheticals, one discussed as a menu, and enough provincial appointments traded over naked men exercising to staff, on paper, a second empire. He forgets professionally. It is understood in the household that when Onesimus is freed — the will is written, the sum named, Servilia has seen to it with her usual prospective kindness — he will forget his own manumission ceremony by the following morning, out of habit.

The exercise yard first: the ball game is at the stage where old friendships are being audited at speed. A former praetor with a knee like a rusty hinge is holding the centre by reputation alone, directing younger men with a general's economy: a chin here, a lifted eyebrow there, the whole art of command reduced to upholstery. Lentulus takes three rounds, no more; more would be a statement about Syria, less would be a statement about his shoulder, and the yard reads statements the way the tax office reads returns, professionally and without charity. He plays well enough to be unremarkable, which in this company is a form of excellence no one will ever carve.

In the anointing room the news is hung up with the clothes. A letter from Athens is doing the rounds in summary — Hadrian has been archon, Hadrian has been initiated, Hadrian has opinions about a temple that has waited six hundred years for a roof and will now, the summary implies, be roofed by personality alone. A young attaché recently returned to Rome is retailing it all with the exhausted air of a man whose luggage contained, besides linen, the future.

“He spoke Greek to the masons,” the attaché says. “Not through a secretary. To them.”

“Barbarous,” says the former praetor, pleasantly, towelling a knee that predates the fashion. “An emperor-in-waiting who can talk to workmen will expect answers. There'll be an end to government.”

Nobody says emperor-in-waiting again. The phrase does a small, satisfied circuit of the room anyway, the way the pickpocket did the Forum crowd, feeling for attention to settle in. Onesimus, at the wall, forgets it in three languages. Lentulus, submitting to oil and the scraper, files it where he files all such futures: under weather, eastern, approaching. Trajan is not old as emperors go and is fit as a man can be who has spent his life being carried toward wars expressly to walk through them; but the succession in Rome is a bath-house topic the way rain is a farmer's, not because it is imminent but because everything planted waits on it. A Syrian command under Trajan is a career. The same command remembered under his successor is either a recommendation or a headstone, and a man calculating the one, in warm rooms, naked as an egg, does well to calculate the other.

The scraper finds the Moesia shoulder and the old injury sends up its small, familiar dispatch: present, not urgent, keeping the minutes. He got it falling from a horse that had been described to him by a quartermaster as steady, a word he no longer allows in documents. History, in other people's telling, has promoted the fall into a skirmish; a nephew once asked about the skirmish at dinner and Lentulus, to Servilia's audible approval down the table, described the horse instead, at length, until the skirmish died of documentation. It remains his favourite of his own speeches. There are so few of them with a horse in that he is willing to sign.

"Your son was here at the sixth hour, dominus," says the bath attendant, who is called Felix too — half the useful men in Rome are — and who retails the household's movements to the household as a kind of preventative medicine. "With young Avidius. They won at ball. There was a matter of a wager settled amicably, and the young master paid a debt for a friend which the friend had intended to settle by talking. The talk, if I may say so, was filed as insufficient."

"Whose debt?"

"The friend's name was not in my hearing, dominus. The sum was in everyone's."

Lentulus holds out his arm for the towel with the expression of a man receiving a committee report in a format he prefers to the Senate's. Marcus paying other men's debts: there is a future in that sentence in several denominations, and all of them will arrive at his atrium in the end, because that is what sons and aqueducts have in common in his life at forty-five — what is sent downhill comes home by the plumbing. He says, "If my son's generosity is to be a season, Felix, the house would like the weather early."

"I shall keep the sky watched, dominus," says Felix, and they go through into the heat in their order, senator, slave, oil, news, like a small procession at a dedication nobody has inscribed.

Acilius, who will be consul within the year if the emperor's favour holds, falls into step beside him in the warm room with the ease of a man who has rehearsed spontaneity. "Syria," Acilius says, naming the whole conversation in advance so that they can both pretend to have wandered into it. "The emperor will want a governor in place before he moves east. A name that reassures the legions and does not frighten the Senate. Yours is spoken."

“Names are spoken in baths the way steam is made. Abundantly and on purpose.”

“Yours is also spoken at dinner.” Acilius lowers himself into the water with a sigh that is half politics, the sound a man makes to suggest that what follows is reluctant. “There is one — untidiness. It is said your committee work looks personal. In a candidate for Syria, personal is a colour the emperor does not wear.”

“And who says it looks personal?”

“People who dine on the Caelian.” Acilius smiles with his eyes only, a trick of men who expect to be carved one day and are practising for the bust. “Old friend, I have eaten there. Half the men who will vote on your appointment have eaten there. The food is excellent and the discretion has been, until now, architectural. If you shake that house, things will fall out of it. Some of them will have names you need.”

The water is at Lentulus's ribs. Heat works on the old injury in his shoulder, the one from a horse in Moesia that history has since promoted into something more martial in other people's telling. He thinks of his father's voice on the subject of appetites: A Cornelius may have them. He may not be had by them. He thinks, unbidden and therefore with irritation, of a courtyard in a house that no longer stands, of a girl laughing with a stylus behind her ear like a flower, utterly unaware that a stylus behind the ear was, in his father's Rome, a flag planted on the wrong hill.

“I am not shaking a house,” he says. “I am proposing that houses which profit from the sons of senators be registered, taxed and inspected like any other trade that could burn a neighbourhood down. If that reads as personal, it is because Rome personalises everything except responsibility.”

“Then make it read as general,” Acilius says mildly. “Inspect ten houses. Inspect twenty. At present you have inspected one, at dawn, by committee. Rome can count, Lentulus. That is its least attractive quality.”

The cold room receives them like a verdict. Men go into the water with sounds they would not permit themselves in the Senate and come out of it looking, briefly, the age they were when the century was still negotiable. Acilius, who does everything in order, including spontaneity, waits until they are both in up to the waist and the attendants have withdrawn to the distance that Onesimus has arranged with a look — Onesimus and the Acilian equivalent having conducted, in five seconds of eye contact, the entire diplomatic history of their profession — before he finishes the conversation the warm room started.

"Hadrian writes that Athens is teaching him what Rome is for."

"Athens," Lentulus says, "has been teaching Romans what Rome is for for two hundred years. We keep enrolling. It saves thinking."

"He also asks — through Plotina's people, so it is a question with a return address — who in Rome can draft. Not speak. Draft. A man who can put a complicated thing in a sentence that walks. Your name came up in a context I chose not to improve."

The cold is doing its work on the shoulder: first outrage, then a deep, clean ache, then the body's reluctant agreement that it is still a going concern. Lentulus looks at the mosaic under the water, Neptune in pieces of coloured stone, his trident refracted into something pastoral. "I am flattered to be a context."

"You are being offered a chance to be useful to a future that has not yet had the courtesy to announce itself. It is the only kind of usefulness that compounds." Acilius ducks under (Once. Correctly. As if there were marks.), and comes up streaming. "Drop the single-house siege, Lentulus. Make it a registry, make it general, make it boring, and let Athens hear of a draftsman. Or keep the siege, and let Athens hear of a feud. Feuds are memoir. Drafts are government."

On the far side of the plunge, a gaunt equestrian who made money in the Spanish mines is telling the water about his kidneys, in detail, with dates. Two boys — not young enough to be charming, not old enough to be listened to — are conducting a drowning contest that the attendants will stop at the precise moment it becomes the kind of death that needs paperwork. The ordinary empire, naked, wet, going about its real business of being a place. Lentulus watches it the way he watches the Forum from the portico: as a system that works best at everything except admitting what it is.

“When I was twenty-four,” he says, and stops, because the sentence has arrived without its paperwork and the cold room is not a locked one.

Acilius, who has known him since they were both young enough to be corrected by tutors, does the most senatorial thing available: he does not hear the beginning of the sentence. He hears the whole of its history, files it, and answers the part that can be answered in water. “When you were twenty-four, we all drafted badly. Some of us with juries, some with marriages.” He hauls himself out onto the edge and sits dripping, a future consul at the mercy of a towel. “I have a dinner Thursday. Plotina's freedwoman will be at it, which means the empress will know by Friday what was served, in both senses. Come. Bring Servilia. Leave the committee at home in a locked room; it's what they're for.”

“My wife,” Lentulus says, “says this family cannot feed pets.”

“Your wife,” Acilius says, “should be governing Syria. It would save everyone a great deal of ceremony, including the Syrians.” He stands; the towel arrives; the future resumes its clothes in the next room. “Thursday, Lentulus. And if your son is going to pay his friends' debts, tell him to do it before the vintage. Generosity in a young man reads as principle. After a bad harvest it reads as a system.”

He goes out with his people in their order. Lentulus stays in the water a count of fifty longer than comfort advises, because the cold is the one counsel in Rome that wants nothing from him, and because Onesimus, at the wall, has the face of a man who has forgotten three futures since the oil and will forget this one into the record too — all of it held, all of it sealed, like a tablet in a cupboard under a mask.

The baths know a man’s circumstances before his banker does, because the banker requires figures and the baths merely watch who arrives with whom when the steam makes hierarchy hard to wear. Lentulus has been coming here since he was young enough to believe that being naked among equals constituted a republic. Age has added a shoulder wound, a wife who understands seating as strategy and an awareness that attendants see more constitutions altered in a week than the Senate floor.

Acilius has taken the bench with the best acoustics: close enough to hear whether the province-talk has changed temperature, far enough away not to be quoted as the source of the weather. “You are being described now as flexible,” he says.

“That sounds like an insult in a dancer.”

“In a Cornelius it is practically legislation.”

Two benches over a contractor is explaining the eastern appointment to a man who has come only to have his back scraped. The explanation includes the emperor, grain and the dangers of committees whose members take notes. Lentulus’s name passes through it like an item being handed along a dinner table by people who do not intend to eat from it.

Acilius watches him not react. “There was a time you would have had him corrected by a client.”

“There was a time I had clients for that demographic. We are learning where the water goes.”

“You sound almost content.”

“Do not tell the baths.”

The plunge pool is crowded with youth performing invulnerability. Marcus is not among them today, which itself becomes a rumour by the second room. Lentulus finds he approves of the new scarcity. A son who is no longer available in every wet room of the city cannot be priced as easily. He can be imagined, of course—Rome can imagine anything it is not fed—but imagination lacks the authority of a fresh sighting.

Near the oil stand a minor official is asking whether the registry will make women like the Caelian house safer or only better reported. The question is delivered loud enough to be an invitation. Lentulus says nothing. Acilius says, when they are beyond him, “You let it pass.”

“It was not a question. It was a lease application for an opinion.”

The steam takes them, equal and not equal, senators among contractors, grandfathers among thieves of towels. Lentulus thinks how many facts in his life have reached him in rooms where other people were washing. His father used the baths for deciding marriages. He has used them for receiving the news that history had decided him. It may be the family's true Senate house: hot, echoing and full of people pretending the water is what makes them equal.

■

Marcus hears about the conversation before his father's oil is dry, because the baths have a second plumbing system, made of slaves, and his dice creditors keep him plumbed in. He hears it in the version that will do the rounds by dinner: Lentulus warned off the Caelian by Acilius. Syria in the balance. The woman has names. He is twenty years old and the news strikes him not as danger but as proof — proof that the house on the Caelian, where the wine is honest and a freedwoman sings like a person addressing him rather than his pedigree, is the one true place in Rome where power admits what it is.

He goes there that night because going there has acquired, in the alchemy of prohibition, the flavour of a political position. Antonia sees him come in. She sees the friend he has brought, a young Avidius with shipping money and a laugh too loud for the room he is in, and she performs, in a single glance exchanged with Diomedes, the whole arithmetic of the evening: what the boy's presence costs his father, what it earns the house, what it risks for Daphne, who is — she hears it in the first phrase — singing better than she has sung all month, which is its own kind of risk.

"You should send me away," Marcus says to her in the interval, with the bravado of youth offering its hostess a sword to fall on. "My father would. In your place."

"I am not in his place," Antonia says. "That has been established by committee. Drink your wine slowly, Marcus. It is the only advice I give young men that they can follow without a tutor."

"He wants you closed."

"He wants to be seen wanting me closed. There is a difference, and the difference is where I live." She is aware, even as she says it, of the Avidius boy listening with the deep attention of new money at an old lesson. She pitches the next sentence for him too. "Your father and I disagree about the governance of this city. He believes it is governed from the Senate house. I believe it is governed wherever men tell the truth after the fish course. We are both, in our way, patriots."

Marcus laughs, delighted, disloyal, young. Across the room Daphne returns the necklace — Antonia watches the choreography, the little press of the palm, the sentence about musicians — and watches the boy receive his own lie back as a keepsake, and love the woman who returned it the way men love being forgiven beautifully: entirely, and for about a week, exactly as predicted.

Daphne sings the second set differently, and the room knows it before it knows why. The first set is always the house's: accomplished, priced, a demonstration that everyone's money is in the right building. The second set, on the nights it happens, is the singer's. Antonia, who could forbid it — she could forbid anything in these rooms; that is what ownership means when a woman has bought it in the currency she has — permits it on an economic principle she would not insult Daphne by explaining: a woman who never sings her own set will one day sing somebody else's, in somebody else's house, and take the room's heart with her as severance. Generosity, like honesty, is a long position. Eirene, who has heard this doctrine applied to rings, menus and one unforgettable negotiation with a lamp-seller over a daughter's dowry, refers to it in the kitchen as the mistress's religion, second service.

Tonight the second set is a song from the theatres that Daphne has slowed, the way she slows street tunes, until the comedy has drained out of it and the woman in the song — a slave girl in the original, getting the better of a master the audience has paid to see fooled — stands in the music with her trickery suddenly looking like the only arithmetic on offer. The room laughs in the wrong place, from habit, and stops. The grain men stop. The elderly advocate, who has heard this song in its fast version perhaps four hundred times since the last emperor but two, leans forward on his couch with a lawyer's outrage at new evidence.

Marcus does not laugh at all. Antonia, at the room's edge, watches a senator's son hear a comedy become a census and — count it, she tells herself, it may be the only honest minute of his education to date — watches him not reach for his cup to get out of it. Across the room young Avidius is less fortunate in his refuge: he laughs alone, a barge of a laugh, discovers the harbour empty, and converts it, with the grace his family is buying at such expense, into a cough that fools nobody except, kindly, the girl pouring his wine, who files it under new money, improving.

After, Daphne comes down from the music the way divers come up: in stages, with the room's applause arriving around her like light through water. Marcus is on his feet, which Romans of his order are not, for performers, in dining rooms — a small constitutional crisis conducted in footwear. He sits down again without looking at anyone, as if standing had been something done to him by the building. Antonia makes a note in the third book, the one that lives behind her ribs: the boy has a conscience in his ears. It will be educated out of him or it will educate him; either way, in this city, somebody will charge for the tuition.

“Again?” says the advocate, to the room, organising opinion like a man with fifty years' practice at juries. “At the fast speed, this time, so that we may all recover our characters.”

Daphne looks at Antonia. It is the house's look: your room, your call, my voice, my terms. Antonia nods once — fast, then home, the voice is a capital asset — and the song goes round again at its theatre pace, bright as paint, and the room, restored to itself, laughs in all the right places with an energy that has relief in it, and money. Only Prima, in the linen room beyond the half-open door, sewing by lamplight a border for a house that measures doorways for officials and drinks songs at two speeds, keeps time with the slow version. She has never heard it before.

She will find, in the morning, that she has stitched seven flowers to it after it ended, like a sentence continuing itself in a hand that has just learned new spelling.

Prima is there that night too, but not as guests are there. She has come after dark because the baker's mother, that inspector of hems, has kept her all day unpicking a sleeve, and the border of red flowers must be finished before the hanging is wanted for a banquet of Alexandrians. She works in the small room off the courtyard where the linen is kept, and through the half-open door she can hear the singing, and under the singing the talk, and under the talk a quality she does not have a word for, though she will learn several before the year is out: ease. The ease of people who believe the room will hold them.

Barbatus brings her water without being asked, which for Barbatus is a speech. “Your father know you're here after dark?”

“My father knows I am finishing work for a house that pays on the day.” She bites off a thread. “He knows the name of the street. He chooses the rest of his knowledge the way we all do.”

Barbatus, who killed men in the arena for eleven years and has since developed strong views about the management of doorways, considers this. “You've a look of someone,” he says.

“So have you. It's called a face.”

He laughs, a sound that turns a head or two in the courtyard, and goes back to his door. But the remark stays with him, the way a song stays, trivial and exact. He has a look-of-someone feeling about the needlewoman, and Barbatus trusts his instincts in proportion to how little language they require.

Prima finishes the row as the music changes in the far rooms — a singer resting, instruments being argued with in low voices, the house taking the breath it takes between selves. Her eyes are dry from the lamp; her back, where the stool's edge has been conducting a four-hour negotiation, presents its invoice all at once. She rolls the work the way her mother taught her, face inward, so that whatever the world does to it in transit happens to the back of the flowers. Out of provinces of habit like this, her whole life is governed. A year ago she would not have had the thought; tonight, in a house where rules arrive with reasons attached and women correct each other's words in passing, she notices her own government and wonders — it is the second treacherous comparison of the week, and she lets this one stand, being tired — what a life would feel like in which the rules were hers in more denominations than cloth.

Eirene is waiting at the courtyard door with the lantern and a shawl that is not Prima's.

“It belongs to the house,” Eirene says, before the refusal can get itself itemised. “Houses own shawls the way harbours own rope. You'll bring it back with the spring work and Diomedes will enter it as thread. Everything here is entered as thread. I have been entered as thread myself, in difficult years.”

The street at night is another Rome, let out of its daytime filing. The watch goes past with its buckets and its air of a department that has seen every fire twice. A drunk is being walked home by two slaves with the tenderness of men carrying a sofa through a doorway in their employer's best room. Somewhere above the street a woman is singing a child down in a language Prima half knows from the vats — one of the river tongues, part Latin, part everywhere the river has been — and Eirene, carrying the lantern high the way she carries everything, as if it had a right to be seen with, says, “Your father will be awake.”

“He's awake when I'm out. It's his watch. He says the house makes noises a man should supervise.”

“Men say that about houses, money and daughters. It's their word for standing in a doorway.” Eirene steps around a puddle that holds the lamplight up to them like an offering. “Mine stood in doorways professionally — a porter, in the Subura, in the house where Antonia and I —” She stops. It is only the smallest check, a stitch counted twice, but Prima, whose trade is noticing the place where a pattern hesitates, notices. “— where we were girls,” Eirene finishes, at the same pace, like a woman stepping over the puddle she has just pointed out. “Count your blessings, Prima. Your doorways are honest.”

Prima nods under the borrowed shawl, not trusting the moment with a question. She has grown up in rooms where the past was present as furniture: things not sat on, a mother's saying about stairs used daily and never explained, an old woman at the vats who looks at her sometimes the way Mother Livia looks at a hem — as evidence being kept for a later inspection. She knows, the way you know weather from a roof you have lived under, that her life has a sealed room in it. She has always known. What she does not know is whether other people's lives don't, or whether, as she is beginning, tonight, walking home beside a freedwoman with a lantern from a house that files kindness as thread, to suspect: it is only the poor who are expected to live in one room and call it honesty.

At the bridge, the river is doing its night work, carrying the city's lights away in pieces too small to invoice. Tibur stone, island temple, a barge going down unlit on the current's own authority. Eirene stops at the crossing by arrangement — to the crossing, the mistress said, and Prima, who thought it a measure of distance, understands at the lantern's turning that it is also a measure of neighbourhood: this far a Caelian lantern may escort a fuller's daughter without becoming a story; beyond this, the street is hers again, and stories, like debts, should be contracted at home.

“Thursday,” Eirene says, “for the border's end. Bring your appetite; the mistress has lost patience with your father's foreign policy about her kitchen and is filing lunch as a materials inspection. You may tell him the house inspects you with soup. It has the advantage of being true in every particular the guild would check.”

Prima goes down into Transtiberim in the dark she was raised in, which receives her without commentary. Her father is awake, as advertised, supervising the house's noises from the doorway with his honey cooling beside him. He looks at the shawl. He looks at the work-box. He does not ask the questions, because keeping, in his book, includes keeping a daughter's day unopened until she chooses a knife.

“Flowers done?” he says.

“Flowers nearly. Soup Thursday,” Prima says, hanging the borrowed shawl where the damp won't find it. “Filed as an inspection. You can't refuse an inspection, Father. It's the law of houses.”

Vibius regards her with the expression she will remember, later, when she has a whole archive of his expressions and no more being added to it. “Then inspect thoroughly, girl,” he says. “And tell the house from me: we know good work across the river. We can smell it through the vats.” He coughs, and drinks, and lets her heat the honey again without either of them saying why it has gone cold.

At the door-book, later, Antonia does the night’s other accounting, the kind Diomedes enters in the first hand because it must look boring to survive: who came, who paid, who signed, who was carried out by friends conducting themselves like pall-bearers at a rehearsal. Barbatus reads the street back to her in his door-keeper’s Latin — watch passed twice, no trouble, a senator’s chair took the wrong turning at the corner and righted itself without witnesses, the rain considering a return engagement. Young Avidius left on foot with the heir of the Cornelii, which Barbatus reports as he would report weather over a harbour his family now, in effect, has cargo in. “Walking,” he adds, “at a talking pace. The young one with the laugh did most of it. The young master did the listening. I marked it as a first, mistress, in case there's a register.”

“There is always a register,” Antonia says. “That is the committee's whole theology.”

She closes the book on a night that has made the house money, cost it nothing it cannot replace, and left her with the feeling — she distrusts feelings that arrive without invoices; they tend to be other people's, delivered to her address by mistake — of a seam she cannot see being stitched somewhere offstage, with good thread, at somebody else's prices. In the corridor the lamps are going down by sections, the theatre unlit from the front. Daphne's door has its red wool on it already: a voice is sleeping; knock and be billed. Philomela is somewhere being witty to the night staff for the professional pleasure of staying in practice. And in the small dining room Eirene is doing the last flowers, which means she has something to say that requires her hands to be otherwise employed when she says it.

■

Eirene is the one who says it. Later, much later, when the guests have gone and the money has been counted and the lamps are being trimmed down to their night setting, she says it in the tone of a woman putting a cup exactly in the middle of a table. “The needlewoman. Prima. Have you looked at her, Antonia? Not at her work. At her.”

“I look at everyone. It is how this house survives.”

“You look at everyone the way a customs officer looks at cargo. Look at her the way you look at a mirror in bad light. Against your will.”

Antonia's hands, which are counting by touch — she can count coin in the dark, a skill from a life she does not narrate — do not stop. That they do not stop is information, and Eirene, who has known her since they were both somebody else's property in a house in the Subura where the stairs smelled of cabbage and ambition, receives it as such.

“She is a fuller's daughter from Transtiberim,” Antonia says. “She is betrothed to a baker. She sews a straight seam. Rome is full of girls — women — with dark brows, Eirene. It manufactures them. It is one of its industries.”

“Count her years.”

“I have counted everything in this house twice today.” The coins go on moving. “Do not make me count that.”

Eirene says nothing more. She puts the trimmed lamp down between them, where it burns with a small, upright flame, and the two women sit a while in the aftersound of the house — water somewhere, a latch, Barbatus telling the night porter a story with a long, dishonest preamble — while Antonia finishes the count and gets it wrong, and begins again, and gets it right, and writes the right number down in a hand that only shakes on the last figure, where no one who did not already know her would think to look.

Chapter Five

A Short History of Stairs

. . .

She does not tell it. That is the first thing to understand about Antonia and the past: it is not a story she withholds, the way other women withhold a lover's name for the pleasure of the withholding. It is more like a room in a house she owns, whose door she keeps locked not from shame but from housekeeping. What would be the use of opening it daily? The furniture does not change. And yet a house is shaped by its locked rooms. the people outside them learn to walk certain ways.

There was a house, though. Let the record — which is only her, at night, settling accounts the tax office will never audit — admit that much. A house on the Quirinal, old, cold in winter through some principle of its architecture, where her mother, freed too late to enjoy it and dead too soon to describe it, had been a hairdresser; where Antonia, born while her mother was still enslaved and therefore born, as the law so gracefully puts it, into her owner's property, grew up as an accessory to other women's mornings: holding the mirror, fetching the pins, learning, with the speed of a child who understands that knowledge is the one ration that cannot be short-weighted, to read from the letters left open on dressing tables.

The son of the house was seven years older and home between tutors. This is the locked room's main piece of furniture and she has stopped dusting it: Gnaeus at twenty-four, between a military tribunate and a marriage being negotiated like a border, discovering in his father's house a slave girl of seventeen who could read his Greek over his shoulder and correct, once — once was enough; the room still contains the sound of his laugh — his scansion of a line about a woman at a loom, waiting, which the poet calls faithful and the girl, before she could stop herself, called unpaid.

The Quirinal house ran, as such houses do, on a staff of small, complete governments. Philodorus the steward governed paper. A freedwoman called Lalage governed the women's side with a voice she could lay across a courtyard like a plank. Antonia's mother governed hair, which sounds like the least of the provinces and was, in a house receiving bridal embassies, something close to foreign affairs: a Cornelian daughter-in-law was being negotiated that year the way provinces are, in stages, with scouts, and every scout came through the dressing rooms first, where the women of the visiting houses sat under Antonia's mother's hands and talked, as women under hairdressers' hands have talked since hair, about the things their men believed were being settled elsewhere.

Antonia held the mirror for these sessions from the age of nine. A mirror held steady is an education you cannot confiscate. She learnt the Servilii's finances before she learnt the word for them, from a visiting aunt whose hair was being dressed for a dinner at which money was not to be mentioned. She learnt that the young Gnaeus was difficult about the match, this from Lalage retailing and her mother pricing, in the shorthand of women who run the rooms where matches are actually audited. She learnt the phrase a settlement, with its whole future curled inside it like a hair on a heated iron. And she learnt to read — this is the inheritance no will itemised — because letters left open on dressing tables are a library for a girl whose job is stillness, and because her mother, who could not read four words in a row, understood with the whole of her thwarted intelligence that letters were the one luggage a slave carries that no steward can search.

“Sound it,” her mother would say, at night, in the little room behind the women's corridor where the combs slept in oil, pointing at a laundry list Antonia had rescued from a basket. “Not loud. The house doesn't need to hear its linen counted twice.”

So her literacy arrived the way everything in her life would: quietly, out of other people's leavings, at the full rate of attention. Greek came later and worse — from a tutor's slave who copied texts in the library and traded declensions for kitchen privileges, in the freemasonry of the unfree who are building weapons out of the household surplus. By fifteen she could follow a letter; by sixteen, an account; by seventeen, she knew which of the two a man was lying in, a distinction that has since capitalized a house on the Caelian.

It was the accounts, officially, that brought her to the young master's rooms. Gnaeus, home between tutors and tribunate, was supposed to be learning the estates; the estates, presented by Philodorus in rolls that smelled of oak galls and other people's weather, bored him in the particular way of clever young men who believe boredom is a form of judgment. He set the girl who brought his mother's messages to copying a rental roll because her hand was quicker than his secretary's and because — the locked room admits this much furniture — he liked the way she mocked nothing while seeing everything, a discipline no one had taught him and everyone in his family performed as sneering, which is different.

“You read over my shoulder,” he said once, not looking up from the Greek.

“The master reads aloud,” Antonia said. “The room is entitled.”

“The room is entitled to silence.”

“Then the room is owed arrears, dominus.” She said it to the rental roll. She was seventeen years old and her whole life was a staircase people carried things down; she did not know yet that a sentence like that, in a house like this, to a son like this, is a door being built by its own noise.

He laughed. It was the laugh, still. He began, after that, to leave texts where the room was entitled: a page of history open at a siege, a speech against a governor his father admired, the poem about the woman at the loom. He taught her the letters properly because teaching her the letters improperly had already happened, in the way his class does everything — by accident, then by system, then by claiming the system. He talked about the law’s categories the way young men talk about constellations: as if naming them were governing them. Manumission entered the conversations, as money enters a bridal negotiation, warmly, vaguely, and without a date. She banked the teaching and discounted the talking, which is to say she was the only adult in the room, and the room, in the end, sent the bill for both of their educations to the usual address.

Her mother knew. Lalage knew. Philodorus, who governed paper, began to keep a kind of paper that is only kept in stewards' heads, in columns. There was a morning in the women's corridor when her mother, arranging another woman's hair for a betrothal visit, said — to the hair, to the air, to the government of stillness in which her daughter stood holding a mirror — "A house will forgive a son anything except being seen to need forgiveness. Remember which of the two of you a house can sell to restore its view."

Antonia remembered. She remembered it on stairs in Baiae with her whole body doing the work of memory. It is one of the sentences — there are perhaps six — that she has carried unspent through every currency Rome has offered her since, and it is the reason that, in her own house, twenty years later, no woman is ever asked to be invisible in the service of anybody's view. The rooms can be discreet. The women are registered. There is a difference, and the difference, as she once told a tax official who had not asked, is where she lives.

What happened after is not romance, whatever the poets who now eat at her tables would make of it for a fee. It was what happens in houses where one person's no is a legal nullity and the other person's yes is the weather. And it was — this is the part she has never found a filing place for, not in twenty years of excellent systems — also tenderness. He taught her letters properly, then accounts. He talked, in the manner of young men discovering principles, of manumission as if it were a gift he had personally invented. She believed the teaching and discounted the talking, which is to say she was the only adult in the room, and she was seventeen, and pregnant by the spring.

His father also kept accounts. The old Cornelius — another Gnaeus, they are all Gnaeus, it saves carving — settled the matter the way his class settled rain through a roof: by paying someone else to stand under it. The marriage to Servilia was advanced by a year. Antonia was sold, on a morning when Gnaeus was at a muster on the Campus, to a dealer with a household to staff in Baiae; sold, specifically, with her increase, as the contract's Latin puts it, a phrase she read upside down on the dealer's tablet while standing very still with her hands folded, already practising, though she did not know it, for a life in which stillness would be her most expensive garment.

What she remembers of Baiae is stairs. Houses for pleasure are built down hillsides and serviced up them. She remembers the weight of water, the weight in her body changing its address month by month, a midwife with hennaed nails, and a morning — the locked room's floor is worn here, this is where her memory paces — when the child had come in the night and gone by the morning, not strong, said the midwife, a girl, not strong, and there was money in the midwife's sleeve that had not been there the day before, and Antonia, feverish, emptied, seventeen going on a hundred, did the arithmetic she had been taught by the son of the house and arrived, correctly, at the only conclusion that let her stand up and climb stairs again within the fortnight: that her daughter was dead, because the alternative arithmetic — sold on, given away, exposed on a hillside where the pious left unwanted arithmetic for the gods — did not permit standing up at all.

Baiae in the season is Rome with its guard down and its prices up: great houses terraced into the bay like an audience settling for a long performance, oyster beds in the shallows making their slow, litigious fortunes, and everywhere the water doing the thing water does to Romans who can afford it, which is persuade them they are simpler people than their tailors know. The house Antonia was sold to belonged to a dealer who supplied staff the way other men supply lamps: by the gross, with replacements. She was entered in his books as girl, literate, with increase — he kept books; she read herself in them one morning while delivering a tally to his office, upside down, the position in which Rome has allowed her to read most of the important sentences of her life — and she was put, for her literacy, not to the hardest carrying but to the count of it, which in a pleasure house means counting other people's carrying and carrying enough yourself to keep the count honest.

She kept the laundry tally for ninety stairs. She kept the wine tally against a steward who watered by doctrine and confessed by arithmetic, his figures having a tell, like a gloss in a text: they improved toward festivals. She kept — this is the locked room's apprenticeship, the one her Caelian house would one day be built out of — a private tally besides, on a potsherd, in a hand she let nobody see. Days. Weeks by her body's calendar. The fee a midwife charged women who could pay not to be recorded, overheard in a kitchen and stored. The price, quoted by a dealer at dinner, of a healthy child sold young into a good house — a good house, the phrase sat at the dealer's table like a guest who has not been introduced to the dishes. She did sums on the sherd that no one had set her. All of them came out the same way: whatever happened in the winter, it would happen to a person with no column of her own, and the only column she would ever get was the one she taught herself to keep standing in.

The midwife's nails were hennaed. That is filed. What is also filed, and has been walked over in the locked room until the floor shines, is a conversation on the stairs two nights before, between the midwife and a man whose Latin had a Quirinal polish on it that Baiae money does not buy. Antonia heard half of it from a landing with a basket — half is the servant's portion everywhere; it is why servants' histories have the soundness of bridges and the completeness of ruins. The man's half contained the phrase no record in this house. The midwife's contained a sum, and then a sum improved, the way sums at dealers' tables improve toward festivals. Antonia was seventeen and vast as a harbour with the child and giddy on the stairs with the weight of the two of them, and she understood — the understanding arrived the way it would arrive all her life, first in the hands, carrying on carrying, while the mind took the stairs behind her — that the arrangements being made around her body were not medical.

She thought of saying it. To whom: that was the whole of the rest of the conversation, conducted with herself at the tally desk that night, in columns. To the dealer, who had bought her with increase and would sell the increase as a separate line, being a man who kept books? To the steward, Philodorus' southern colleague in the government of paper? To the young man on the Quirinal, whose laugh was by then a room she could no longer afford to stand in, who was being married that autumn to a settlement with good hair? A letter — she could write letters; letters were the luggage — a letter would be read by everyone whose hands it passed through, which is to say it would arrive as evidence in an inquiry she would not survive attending. She turned the potsherd over and wrote nothing. It is the only unwritten letter in the archive she keeps between her ribs, and its text, all these years, is still just the address.

What she did instead — the record should be allowed this, since Rome has so little paperwork on the virtues of seventeen-year-old slaves in winter — was work. She worked the stairs until the week her body informed the house otherwise, and she arranged, with a laundress from the town who had a sister across the river in Rome and a face like reliable weather, a thing that had no column: that if anything survived the winter with her name on it in any sense the gods inspect, the sister across the river would hear of it. It was not a plan. Plans require standing. It was a thread put through a needle in the dark, by a girl who had learned counting so the stairs would not count her, and who believed — believes; the tense is a locked room too — that a thread is what you hold while the rest of the house decides whether you were ever in it.

She stood up. That is the whole of the heroic part, and it took years. A steward in Baiae liked her head for figures more than her face, a rare ordering she blessed nightly; a widow in Naples freed her in a will, whether from affection or to spite a son-in-law Antonia never asked; freedom turned out to be a staircase too, only now she could charge for the climbing. Loans at interest to women the banks would not see. A share in a laundry. A dining room in Rome, then two, then the house on the Caelian with the damp in the courtyard wall and the pastry cook arguing about saffron. Antonia Cassia is a name she assembled the way she assembled everything else: good materials, no one's permission.

She does not tell it. Eirene knows the shape of it, the way a person who shares a house knows where the locked room is without ever being shown. And if a needlewoman from Transtiberim holds her head, when counting, exactly the way — no. The count of coin is finished. The count of years she will do when she must, and she has decided, nightly for some days now, that she must not yet.

The Naples widow — let the record, which is hers at night and Rome's by daylight, give the woman her charges in full — was called Octavia Rufa, she was sixty, and she freed Antonia in her will for the stated reason, read out by a notary in a room full of relatives behaving like weather over someone else's harvest, that this woman kept my books and my temper for four years, the second being the harder account. The son-in-law challenged it. The son-in-law is one of the people the Caelian house now overcharges on principle whenever his agents book a room, a tax he has never identified across fifteen years of dinners. Antonia attended the hearing in a borrowed veil and watched a praetor's clerk read her freedom aloud in the tone men use for the minutes of other people's earthquakes. Then she walked out into Naples owning: one set of good clothes, one potsherd she no longer needed and could not throw away, a sum the will called a legacy and the son-in-law called an insult, and the knowledge — it sat on her like a cloak cut for somebody taller — that every paper in the world now had to go through her own hands before it could happen to her.

Freedom, she discovered that winter, is a staircase with a toll at every landing. A freedwoman of no family may keep books for widows, lend small sums, stand surety for women the banks will not see, and be cheated by exactly the same men on exactly the same terms as before, except that now the law will call her a party. It is not nothing, being a party. It is not what the young man's talk in the library promised, either, back when manumission was a gift he had personally invented. She kept the widow's successor's books for a year, at a salary she negotiated standing up — the first thing in her life she had ever negotiated; the sensation, she told Eirene later, in another city, in another life, was like being allowed to be late — and she lent the legacy out in pieces so small a Greek banker laughed at the ledger: to a laundress for a mangle, to a midwife (unhennaed, competent, terrifying) for a room with a door, to a freedman baker whose ovens a landlord was converting into leverage. Every loan was written. Every repayment was witnessed. She charged interest she could defend to the women's faces and collected it with a memory they came, in time, to treat as a neighbourhood utility: ask Antonia, she'll know what your husband signed. It is a short walk, in Rome's sister cities, from being the woman who knows what the paper says to being the woman the paper is brought to before it is signed. Short, and uphill, and lit by other people's lamps.

Eirene arrived in the third year, out of the Subura, out of a house whose owner's death had distributed its staff like an estate — because they were the estate, in the older papers — with a freedom bought by a subscription among the laundry women and a scar of temper where her trust used to be itemised. They recognised each other in a Naples street the way people from sunken houses do: not with embraces, at first, but with information, traded at full value across a bakers' stall — who was dead, who was sold north, whose mother, whose stairs. The embrace came later, in lodgings, with the same economy. Eirene looked at Antonia's books, at the little loans marching like a border of red flowers, each the same, each slightly alive with difference, and said, “You're building a fuller’s shop for money. Takes it in dirty, gives it back clean, charges by the piece.”

“I'm building the thing that would have caught us,” Antonia said.

“Then it wants a bigger door,” Eirene said, “and a kitchen. In Rome. Nobody was ever caught in Naples except by the view.”

So: Rome, two tables, a lamp-seller's credit, a dining room over a fuller's that smelled, on wet days, of home. The rest the city knows in its baths version — a freedwoman with a Greek banker and a pastry cook, who collects senators' secrets like other women collect jet — and the house version, which is Diomedes' three books and the truth filed between the quarters, is nobody's but hers. She has been asked, by men who think a life like hers is a menu they have paid to have explained, how she rose. She considers the word the way she considered a carter's amphora in a January yard. She did not rise. Rising is for bread and empires. She climbed, professionally, a staircase Rome built to be carried up by other people, counting as she went, and at some landing the toll-keepers began, one by one, to be her tenants. That is the whole miracle. It took twenty years. It is still, on the nights when the accounts are done and the house is loud with other people's appetites, the only story in the world she is certain she can tell in the order of the evening and not the order of the questions — because the questions, all of them, arrive from Baiae, and Baiae is a room she owns, whose door she keeps locked not from shame but from housekeeping.

Stairs have their own historiography. Colonnades get architects; armies get bridges; stairs get the people whose work is to move between the levels other people own. At Baiae there were stairs polished by sandals into opinions, stairs that went down to water carrying heat in summer and up again with bedding that smelled of the sea. A girl learned them first in her calves and only later in arithmetic: so many up with weight, so many down empty, a pause at the turn if the overseer’s shadow had gone elsewhere to be important.

Counting made them smaller. That is the first misuse and first mercy of numbers. You could subdivide a punishment until it had edges. You could tell yourself ten more, and sometimes the body believed the fiction for exactly ten.

There were women who sang on the turns—not songs for guests, not music that would be entered anywhere as entertainment, but breaths arranged so the climb did not take the singer by surprise. Antonia would remember these phrases later in rooms where Daphne was being paid to make feeling look classical, and would register the difference with the fairness of a former stair-climber: one kind of singing holds a room, another kind holds the singer.

On the Caelian years afterwards she would catch herself counting the steps between courtyard and office on days when the house was at war with its own success. Seventeen. She knew it was seventeen. The knowledge did nothing to shorten them when a client had to be managed, a tax receipt found, a woman’s contract read at the correct speed in useful light. But it returned the senses to their owner. A person who can count the stairs is not being counted by them.

It is a minor discipline. Empires prefer columns. Lives, for much of their length, are carried up and down in baskets, on trays, under other people’s information, one counted step after another while history breathes at the top and pretends its view is the house.

■

Lentulus does not tell it either. His locked room is better built; architects cost money, and the Cornelii have always spent on structure. In his version, which he has not rehearsed aloud in twenty years and therefore believes to be unrehearsed, he came home from the muster to a father's study redolent of wax and finality and was told that the girl had been sold south, comfortably, the matter concluded, and that his marriage would be celebrated in the autumn, and that a man's youth is a province he governs badly and then, if he is fortunate in his family, is recalled from before the audit.

He asked one question. This is the worn floor in his room. He asked whether there had been a child. His father, who had governed provinces and understood the load-bearing capacity of a pause, said: “There is nothing living with a claim on this house.”

Lentulus was twenty-four. He took the sentence as an answer because he needed it to be one, and he has spent twenty years paying interest on that act of interpretation — in the small hours, in the Senate when a debate touches the exposure of infants or the rights of freedwomen and he finds his own voice arriving before his judgment; in the particular ferocity, which his friends call principle and his wife calls by no name at all, with which he pursues the regulation of houses where other men's sons go to make Gnaeus's arithmetic and call it love.

He married Servilia in the autumn. She knew. He understood that she knew within the first month, from a sentence about Baiae dropped into a conversation about oysters with the precision of a stone into a well, to hear the depth. They have never spoken of it again. It is one of the load-bearing silences of the marriage, along with the Campanian debts and the fact — observed by both, acknowledged by neither — that Servilia would have made the better senator.

The marriage, as marriages of settlement go, was competently unhappy only in its first season and workable thereafter, which among their kind is the material other classes call a success story. Servilia brought land in two provinces, a mind that ran the Palatine house the way Antonia's runs the Caelian — by sections, lit from the back — and the knowledge she dropped into the conversation about oysters at exactly the depth a well requires to be sounded. Lentulus brought the name, the masks, the Moesia shoulder, and a locked room whose existence he announced, as men do, by walking around it for nineteen years. They became, in time, the thing neither of their families had itemised in the contracts: allies. Alliance is not the word the poets dine out on. It outlasts most of the words they do.

There were children in the order the contracts hoped for, which Rome calls Fortune and households call management. Marcus first, loud as a gate. A daughter between who lived nine days and is spoken of in this family, if at all, in the grammar people use for weather in previous consulships — Lentulus, holding the nine-day girl on the last morning with a competence that astonished the women, whose professional opinion of senators' hands was formed elsewhere, understood for the first time the true exchange rate of the sentence his father had sold him at twenty-four: nothing living with a claim on this house. Nothing living was doing heavy work in that sentence, like a slave carrying water in a pleasure house. He paid the midwife — a Roman one, unhennaed, expensive — three times her fee and told the steward to record it as household linen. Servilia, coming off the childbed into a house performing a grief it was not certain it had budgeted for, looked at the accounts a month later and said nothing about the linen. It is one of perhaps six sentences of hers he has carried unspent. It had no words in it. That was the denomination.

Cornelia came three years later and stayed, with the air of a person who has reviewed the house and decided to improve it from inside, at the pace of music. By then Lentulus was on the ladder his name had built: quaestor's accounts audited like sieges, a praetorship, the consulship (suffect, the kind history pronounces with a footnote, which his father received with a toast to the family's momentum, as if they were a stone going downhill in good order). He governed nothing larger than his opinions in those years and governed them in public with distinction. The locked room furnished his speeches the way cellars furnish dinners: nothing was served from it directly; everything tasted of storage. When the Senate debated the exposure of infants on the hillsides — a practice every man in the chamber deplored in the manner of men deploring rain from inside good roofs — Lentulus heard his own voice arrive before his judgment, hot as a boy's, and watched the benches register a Cornelius with a conscience, a phrase that would follow him to the committee, to the baths, to a Greek banker's back room. When the freedwomen's tax was last revised he spoke for putting the collectors under the aediles instead of farming them out to private appetites, and carried it, and came home and drank one cup more than his rule and stood among the masks telling himself — the house has the record of it in the wear on one particular floor tile — that a man may settle a debt in general legislation if the currency is chosen well enough. His father would have agreed. That was the part that kept him standing there.

He saw Antonia twice in those years, before the Caelian house made seeing her a municipal question. Once in Naples, on business of an estate inspection: a woman at a banker's table in a widow's office, no longer carrying anything, signing with the hand he had — the locked room again; the laugh; the stylus — taught its letters, now filing a widow's loans with a competence that made the banker sit like a client. He was conducted past her room on other business. Neither of them was in a position to make it an event, and the city, which appreciates economy, recorded none: a senator looking at paperwork, a freedwoman being paperwork, a corridor functioning. The second time was Rome, the Subura, years later, rain: a dining room's doorway, lamplight, a woman sending a carter back into the street with an amphora in each hand and a sentence that had the whole street laughing with her and at nobody. He sat in his chair unrecognised behind wet leather and did not get out. He has since decided — committees are how his family thinks — that there was no decision to make, both times. A man's life arrives in the order of the evening, not the order of the questions. He did not, until the tablet, permit himself to itemise whose evening it had been.

His father died consul and honoured. The will, when it was read among the masks, contained the usual bequests and one unusual one: a sealed tablet for Gnaeus's eyes, which Lentulus, being his father's son in the matter of locked rooms, has kept sealed for nine years in the cupboard under his grandfather's mask. He tells himself it concerns the estates. He does not open it for the same reason Antonia does not count Prima's years: some arithmetic, once performed, must be acted on, and he has Syria in prospect, and a daughter to marry, and a committee proceeding against a house on the Caelian whose mistress taught him, though she would laugh to hear it, everything he knows about the difference between what a thing is called and what it is.

You tell yourself the tablet is about olive groves. You have always been good at telling yourself things in the tone of a committee, as if a minuted untruth were sturdier than a spoken one. The masks look down. Wax, smoke, paint. Every one of them a man who locked a room and called the house honest.

Chapter Six

The Avidii at Dinner

. . .

To marry Cornelia well, it is first necessary to feed the people who might buy — the word the family uses is ally with — a large number of dinners at which nothing is proposed and everything is assessed. Lentulus dines the Avidii in the third week of the year. Servilia has chosen the menu as a general chooses ground: no dish that requires apology, no wine that suggests either desperation or the newer taste for novelty, and for the centre of the table a boar from the Cornelian woods, because a family that can serve its own boar is still, in the deepest Roman sense, a family that owns the story of its dinner.

Avidius the father is sixty, rich from grain fleets, freeborn son of a man who unloaded them, and possessed of the most dangerous quality in a negotiator: he is genuinely unembarrassed. His son, the young Avidius of the Caelian evenings, sits at the lowest couch and tries not to look at Cornelia with the expression he uses for singers. Cornelia, who has been dressed by her mother into a masterpiece of modesty with a neckline, performs the dinner the way she performs her music lessons, correctly and with an inner life entirely elsewhere, which her father, catching it, recognises as the Lentulus inheritance more truly than the name.

The seating has been worked out by Servilia on a tablet she will deny exists. A dinner of this kind is a map of a country being negotiated: who reclines where, in whose sightline, within reach of which conversation, is the constitution; the food is merely the government's daily business. Avidius the father is placed where the room's light flatters a man of sixty and where the boar, when it comes, will arrive at his left hand like an ally joining a flank. The son is placed low and opposite Cornelia, who is present because daughters being assessed must be visible as evidence and invisible as persons, a branch of optics Servilia has mastered on behalf of a girl she is — though the tablet does not say so — also, in her way, protecting: from this couch Cornelia can see every face at the table and no face can study hers without seeming to. It is the best seat in the room. Nobody will ever tell the guests so.

Cornelia knows. Cornelia, who has been dressed into modesty with a neckline, understands her mother's seating the way she understands her music master's metaphors: as instructions encoded for a reader. From the protected couch she conducts her own assessment, in the hours' long, glazed traffic of being looked past, and her findings, had any committee thought to subpoena them, would have shortened several negotiations. Avidius the father eats like a man who has been hungry in fact and not in rhetoric, and respects a table accordingly. The son eats like a man being watched by a father who has been hungry. Her own father eats like a man making small, exact payments on an enormous loan of attention. Marcus eats like a man refuelling an argument. And her mother eats almost nothing, beautifully, the way generals visit frontiers: to be seen to have confidence in the supply lines.

The talk does its early circuits at the safe altitude: the dedication, the column scaffolding — “A war you can climb inside,” says a cousin of the house, one of the Arpinum line decanted into Rome dinners for ballast, “it's an end to reading, I call it. My books don't have stairs.” — the price of Spanish oil, a lawsuit about a warehouse wall at Ostia, which Servilia steers off the table and into the fish course with a sentence about boundaries being the true poetry of nations. Avidius laughs like a harbour — the sound of timber and money getting along — and Lentulus, who has been waiting for the Ostia wall to come up since a morning client gave it to him like a hot coal in a satchel, disposes of it into the same laugh with a proposal about surveyors over dinner rather than advocates over documents. It is his best moment of the evening. Avidius inclines his great head. Two old Romans have just agreed, between courses, that law is what you threaten and dinner is what you do.

Young Avidius, meanwhile, is being discovered by Cornelia to have a quality the betrothal market does not list because it cannot be faked at scale: he listens with his face. When the cousin from Arpinum tells the story about the augur and the chickens — a story this family has been deploying since before Cornelia was born, with marks on it like height lines on a doorpost — the young man laughs in the new places, the ones the story actually has, rather than the traditional ones. He asks her, across the low table, in the supervised gap between a toast and a sauce, whether she sings.

"I am sung about," Cornelia says, before she can file the sentence under the Greek one, "more than I sing. In this house my voice is issued. One song, at approved houses."

"My father issues my opinions on a similar system," he says. "One per dinner, not the nautical ones. He says a young man should be ballast." He considers the boar being carved with the concentration of a man watching a ship unloaded by a crew he respects. "I think ballast gets a poor report in this city. Ballast is why the cargo arrives."

It is not wit, exactly. Her brother does wit, beautifully, like a man juggling with his grandfather's glass. This is something her education has fewer words for: a young man making himself unremarkable at exactly the rate that lets a room relax around him, the way her mother's seating lets a girl see. Money from grain, her mother says, when the girl reports nothing that evening and is read anyway. A boy who can wince. There have been worse foundations.

The fish course arrives on a platter with its own escort, as fish does in this house, and with it the evening moves, as Servilia's tablet always intended, from reconnaissance to the first real exchange of fire, which in Roman dinners is called compliments. Avidius raises his cup the width of a wall at Ostia toward his host.

"Your committee does you credit," Avidius says over the fish, because new money always compliments old money on its morals; it costs nothing and it sounds like a subscription. "The city wants order. Order is good for shipping."

“Order is good for everything except conversation,” Lentulus says, and the table laughs on cue, and he hates the laugh a little, the purchased sound of it, though he has made the joke precisely to purchase it.

It is Marcus who breaks the evening, as water finds the crack in a jar. He has drunk exactly enough to mistake honesty for courage. “Father's order begins on the Caelian,” he says. “One house at a time. The committee has a short list.”

Silence, with cutlery. Servilia looks at her son the way an engineer looks at a bridge. Avidius the father, who built a fortune by hearing what a room costs, hears this room's price change and files it without moving his face at all. Young Avidius studies his hands. Cornelia — Lentulus sees it peripherally, the way one sees weather — stops being elsewhere. She is entirely, dangerously present.

“My son,” Lentulus says, “has the advocate's fault of stating a case before he has been briefed. The committee's list is the city's list. All unregistered establishments.”

“Of course,” Avidius says, warm, rich, unconvinced, already recalculating a dowry against a scandal surcharge in the privacy of a mind that has never once confused a dinner with a pleasure. “All Rome. Naturally.”

The guests leave in the order Servilia has arranged for their leaving, which is the order that makes it hardest to tell the evening went wrong: principals first, with embraces that have the warmth of treaties; the cousin from Arpinum next, sent off into the wet street rehearsing a version in which he said the thing about boundaries; finally the musicians, paid at the door by the steward in a transaction the household conducts, like all its transactions with art, as if money were slightly embarrassed to be seen working. In the corridor, while cloaks are being found and litters called, young Avidius finds himself beside Cornelia's music master — who has attended, unobtrusively, to tune and to be a reason the girl need not linger — and, in the manner of his family when it wishes to load cargo without a crane, engages the wrong man entirely on purpose.

“She sings the Greek songs?” he says. “The daughter.”

The master, who has survived nineteen houses by answering questions about daughters as if they were questions about weather in distant provinces, says, “The young lady's Greek is excellent.”

“Then somebody should hear it who can tell.” Avidius accepts his cloak from a slave and does the dockside thing again, the thing that has been getting him assessed kindly all evening: he thanks the slave by catching his eye, as men do who have been handed things by grandfathers who unloaded boats. “In my father's house we don't keep quality in the warehouse. It spoils the manifest.”

The music master reports this, later, in the course of being fed in the kitchen — musicians and ex-gladiators being the two professions Roman households feed after use without minuting — and Servilia hears it at third hand while her hair is being taken down, in the braid of voices through doors that constitutes her evening intelligence service. She revises the Avidii by another half degree, the way a banker revises a rate, and files the young man under a heading the family has not used since her own marriage negotiations: possible, with supervision of a kind he may not require.

Cornelia, in her room, with her hair also coming down, in hands not her mother's hairdresser's daughter's but a slave of her own age whose name is Tyche and who has opinions the household has not yet learnt to bill for, says, “He listens with his face.”

“That's ballast,” Tyche says, whose brother works the Ostia boats when there are boats. “My brother says the ship boys learn it or swim.”

“Marcus says I am being sold.” Cornelia says it to the mirror, which is bronze and dented and has heard the women of this house say worse to it for fifty years, usually while being got ready to be looked at. “He says it to be the only honest man in the family. It is his winter coat.”

“Are you, domina?”

“I am being allied with,” Cornelia says. “It is a better garment. Warmer, Marcus says, though somebody else keeps the key to the wardrobe.” She is quiet while the pins come out, each with its small sound on the tray, like a count being taken of the day's true expenditure. “If I must be ballast, Tyche, I would like to know the waters.”

Tyche, who will be freed in Servilia's will and knows it and has therefore the freedom of the almost-free, which is the most dangerous dialect in any household, says, “Ask my brother about the waters, domina. Or —” the hands do not pause, the voice does the pausing for them “— ask at the house on the Caelian. The women there know all Rome's waters. They charge by the piece, I'm told, and the thread is separate.”

Cornelia laughs — once, unissued, a sound made entirely at her own rates — and then doesn't, because the laugh has shown her something in the bronze she is not ready to have seen before her father has finished being spoken to downstairs, in a room full of cooling food and servers moving like a tide going out.

Later, when the guests have gone, Servilia does not raise her voice. She has raised it perhaps four times in nineteen years of marriage; the household still tells the stories. She says, “Your son dines at that house and then discusses yours at my table. Your daughter has just learnt that her marriage is a transaction at which her brother may heckle. And Avidius has learnt that the Cornelii can be embarrassed at their own board, which he will presently charge us for. This is your committee's work, Lentulus. I hope the Senate applauds it as warmly.”

“The boy will be spoken to.”

“The boy is twenty. Being spoken to is your family's substitute for every other form of action.” She is removing her jewellery, piece by piece, into the hands of a slave who has heard everything in this room for a decade and will die having said none of it for money, because Servilia pays for silence prospectively, in kindness, which compounds better. “End it, or win it. Do not keep it. A kept quarrel is a pet, and this family cannot feed pets.”

“Then have the pet's keeper to dinner with an explanation,” Servilia says, in the tone of a woman closing a tablet, and goes out to do the household's night round — kitchen damped, doors witnessed, the day's small treasons of waste and gossip corrected before they harden into systems. She does it on feet that make no announcement. Lentulus has sometimes thought his wife and the mistress of the Caelian are the two people in Rome who understand that authority is mostly the management of approach: no noise until she is in a room, then the room owes her an explanation. He does not say it. There are comparisons a man may think in his own house at night that would constitute, in daylight, a foreign policy.

Marcus is summoned to the study, where being spoken to has been conducted for three generations under a bust of the grandfather whose mask is in the atrium and whose opinions are therefore present twice, in case the room forgets whose walls these are. He comes in still in his dinner clothes, with the particular brightness of a young man who has been drinking just enough to have located his honesty and not yet enough to have lost the address.

“You discussed the committee at my table,” Lentulus says. “In front of the Avidii. In front of your sister.”

“I described the committee. As the baths describe it. As the aediles' own clerks describe it, Father, after the second cup, in establishments your committee is inspecting.” Marcus stands because the study only offers one chair to juniors and he is too angry, or too accurate, to take it. “If the description is a problem, the committee might try being something else.”

“The committee is a registry of—”

“One house,” Marcus says. “At dawn. With a rod.” He does a thing then that the room notices: he stops performing. The brightness goes out of him like a lamp being carried into another room, and what is left is twenty years old and tired in a way his education has no form for. “Cornelia looked at me when I said it as if I'd sold her, at the table, in front of the buyers. I keep thinking: that is the look this house teaches. I have been practising it in mirrors since I was twelve, I just didn't know the occasion.”

Lentulus looks at his son the way he looks at provincial reports he suspects of being true in the wrong direction. “Your sister,” he says, choosing the words as if they were good coin from a bad purse, “will marry where the family can honourably place her, with a settlement her mother will negotiate to the last clause, into a house whose money is newer than ours and whose son, by every report including his conduct at my table under provocation, is not a fool. If that is selling, then every farm my ancestors bought with a bride's dowry is a market stall, and the masks in the atrium are shop signs. We call it alliance because the word obliges both parties to behave as if the transaction were nobler than appetite. The obligation is real even if the word is upholstery. Most of Rome is.”

It is a good speech. It has the columns: family, honour, the etymology of a euphemism audited like a harbour due. Marcus listens to it the way a man listens to weather in a country he means to emigrate from.

“And the house on the Caelian?” he says. “What word obliges us there? Because I dine there, Father — you know I dine there; Onesimus knows by professional forgetting, every bath attendant in Rome knows by retail — and the woman who runs it sends back my messengers with lessons in drinking slowly, and her singer returned a necklace this week because the stones were—” He catches himself, too late, as young men do; the sentence completes itself in his father's face.

“Glass,” Lentulus says. “You gave a woman glass and called them emeralds, and she returned them with a compliment, and now you are hers for a month and truthful for a week.” Marcus stares. Lentulus, who does not know he is quoting the mistress of the house word for word — who cannot know, unless the plumbing now runs in both directions and uphill, which in this city it generally does — finds he has produced the analysis out of whatever men of his experience produce such things: the archive behind the ribs. “It was done to your grandfather by a singer from Alexandria in the consulship of — it doesn't matter. The technique is older than the aqueducts. What matters, Marcus, is whether you learned the price of the stones or the price of the lie. A Cornelius may pay either. He may not remain ignorant of the exchange rate."

"I learned she wouldn't be bought at my rate," Marcus says, quietly. "Which in this family makes her either a bad investment or—"

"Or kin to nobody we can afford." It comes out before Lentulus can file it. The room with the duplicated grandfather receives the sentence in the order of the evening, not the order of the questions, and Marcus — who is twenty, and who will remember this winter in a scroll-case for years — looks at his father with the first intimation that the locked rooms of this house are not a style of carpentry.

"Go to bed," Lentulus says, dismantling the moment with a father's authority, the cheapest tool in the house and the only one that always fits. "Not out. Not at dawn, not by the garden gate. Tomorrow you will call on the Avidii with a note in your mother's Latin apologising for your advocate's manner at dinner. You will not mention committees, emeralds, or honesty. Honesty, Marcus, is a long position. Take it from a house that has been short of it before."

Marcus goes to bed in the sense the house records: his room is occupied, his sandals are by the door, a slave has seen the lamp go down. Rome's great families run on such records; whole treasons have foundered on the sandals. He lies in the dark doing the arithmetic his tutors never set: the cost of a glass necklace, professionally returned; the cost of a sister's face at a dinner table; the exchange rate, currently quoted in his father's study, between a lie and its price. Somewhere below, the house does its night water sounds, the garden fountain conversations it has with itself when the clients have gone. He has grown up over this plumbing the way Prima grew up over the vats. Neither of them, tonight, can hear the similarity. Similarity is for people with a fourth set of books.

He thinks about Daphne's room at the house — not as men of his age are supposed to think about singers' rooms, which is the part he would least survive having minuted, but as a place with accounts in it. She showed him once, between songs, not to impress him but because he had been holding forth about his family's papers like a man showing a wound, the little tablet she keeps: earnings, the Greek's receipts, a note of what her former owner's contract had cost to buy out, paid, in a hand that got steadier as the sum got older. “My first copy,” she said. “I cried over a balance sheet.” He had laughed, from the great height of twenty, at the available targets. Tonight the memory stands in his dark room like a person who has been shown in without being announced.

By the time the watch changes he has done what his family does with unwelcome arithmetic for three hundred years: he has decided to take it to a committee of one, at another address, where the lamps are better and the minutes are kept, as he has started to say at dinners, for the pleasure of the heckle, by women who count. The garden gate is not locked against the heir of the house; it is merely witnessed when he uses it, which is the Cornelian system in its entirety. The door slave, who is paid by Servilia prospectively and in kindness, says, “Young master,” in a tone that goes into no book, and Marcus, going out into the rain with his father's last sentence still spending itself in him — honesty is a long position; take it from a house that has been short of it before — thinks: I will just be rained on, at her door, in the back street, until somebody instructs me in manners. It is not a plan. At twenty, in this family, it is as close to a conscience as makes no difference.

A dinner at which two houses are considering becoming a tide requires more staff than a small war and produces better intelligence. In the kitchen, quantities are being treated as diplomacy: too much luxury and the Avidii will suspect the Cornelii of covering debt with saffron; too little and the Cornelii will have filed themselves under decline. Servilia descends personally to inspect the fish because a woman who has run a household for decades learns that some metaphors must be gutted before guests arrive.

“Which course is the shipping interest meant to admire?” the cook asks.

“The one that arrives warm. Let admiration follow competence for a change.”

Marcus is intercepted on his way past the pantry by Onesimus, who removes from his hand a cup he has already filled with the optimism of a young man expecting to be bored. “Young master,” Onesimus says, “dinner is a succession of small doors. Enter later ones sober enough to know which house you are in.”

“I am always in my father’s house.”

“That,” Onesimus says, “is the ambiguity under management.”

Cornelia, in the music room, is trying out the Greek song at a pace her master describes as “maritime,” meaning apparently that it no longer hugs the coast of his instruction. He has been paid a fee Servilia described in the accounts as continuing, a word that has soothed his tendency to correct from the wrist. When he ventures that a bride should not sound “so knowing”, Cornelia asks whether knowing can be detected from the dining couches or only by professional appointment.

Her mother, entering at exactly the moment an answer might become useful to someone other than Servilia, says, “A bride should sound paid for. Sing the Roman one first.”

“And the Greek?”

“If the harbour asks.”

“It will ask in figures.”

“Then consider the figures foreigners.”

Downstairs Avidius the elder is being shown the dining room by Lentulus and appears to be pricing the past by the square foot. He has the expression of a man trying to work out whether three centuries are load-bearing. “A fine room,” he says.

“It has held worse decisions.”

“Most of mine took place near salt water. The room helped dissolve the evidence.”

It is not yet alliance. It is the sound of two kinds of Roman testing whether the floor complains under both.

■

Marcus, spoken to, goes straight to the Caelian, because at twenty the shortest distance between a rebuke and its repetition is a straight line. The house is quieter tonight: rain, a thin Roman rain that makes the streets shine and keeps the merely curious at home. Daphne is not singing. She is sitting in the small dining room mending a torn strap on her costume — they all mend, Antonia insists on it, a house policy older than Daphne's freedom: no woman here is only ornamental, it rots the soul and the budget — and Prima is beside her, detained by the rain, showing her how to set a stitch so the tear will not remember itself.

Marcus, wet-shouldered, eloquent with grievance, tells the room about the dinner. He tells it well. He has his father's gift for a sentence and none of his father's instinct for an audience. Prima, listening, hears a senator's son describe his sister's marriage as a sale and his father's morals as a siege, and she thinks — with the practical clarity of a girl whose own betrothal contract was read aloud to her once, quickly, by a father who stumbled on the clause about her dowry of tools — that the rich are simply poor people whose transactions have better Latin.

“You shouldn't talk about your sister like that,” she says.

The room looks at her. Daphne's needle stops. Marcus, who is accustomed to being the most interesting thing in any room under senatorial rank, experiences the novel sensation of being corrected by the furniture, and — to his credit, or to Daphne's influence, or to the rain — he does not reach for rank.

“Why not? It's true.”

“Because she isn't here to tell it wrong herself.” Prima ties off the stitch. “My mother used to say a hem tells you how a garment was treated when no one was looking. So does a story.”

“My mother,” Marcus says, “says nothing at all, in several languages.” But he says it without the laugh he arrived with. He looks at Prima then, properly, the way the baths slaves say men look when a lane opens unexpectedly not before them but beside them. “Have I seen you? At the house of — no. At the fuller's. You're the fuller's girl who reads.”

“I am the fuller's daughter who sews,” Prima says. “Reading is what I do instead of sleeping. Like your drinking.”

“Reading,” Marcus says. “Instead of sleeping.” He has found the one dry cushion in the room by instinct and taken it by right of pedigree, and now he addresses Prima across Daphne's mending with the air of a man discovering a province where his coinage is not yet legal tender. “What does a fuller's daughter read? This is not baths talk. I'm asking.”

“Accounts,” Prima says, “that other people do wrong in the second column. Letters for the women in our street whose men are at Ostia with the fleets — reading them, writing back; that's most of reading, in my street: other people's news, held steady.” The phrase arrives in her mouth with a familiarity she can't invoice; painters of words would call it inheritance. “And a book my mother kept. Not a book. Leaves. Recipes. Counts. Names of women in Baiae with the stairs they worked and what the houses owed them when they died. She called it her ledger, though there was no money in it that ever got paid.”

Daphne's needle stops. Daphne, who can hear a false note through a closed door and a true story through Vestals, says, “Your mother kept a ledger of the unpaid.”

“She kept the stairs counted. So they wouldn't count us.” Prima bites a thread. “When she died the guild women wanted to burn it with her — her things, they said. My father pottered about with the honey and said no, very quiet, the way he says things that are already in the accounts. It's in my work-box now, under the needles. It weighs nothing. That's how you can tell it's ours.”

Marcus is looking at the work-box with an expression his tutors were paid to correct and didn't, the exact face Diomedes will see in the spring on a banker's clerk being shown a fourth set of books. “My family keeps the opposite kind,” he says. “Everything paid, entered twice, three hundred years of it, and nobody can say where the money is. My sister is the money now. We're trading her for a harbour.” He says it to the work-box, having learned in the last four minutes not to say it to the room. “I shouldn't talk about her like that. You told me. I'm — practising on the furniture."

"Practise on your father," Prima says, and then, because she is nineteen and has been correcting a senator's heir for an evening in a house her father has forbidden her to eat in, she hears her own audacity arrive like a dropped tray and has to decide, fast, whether to pick it up.

It is Daphne who picks it up, with a singer's timing, threading a needle by a light she seems to be personally on terms with. "Fathers," she says, "are the advanced classes. Furniture first. Then brothers. There will be examinations." She holds the strap up: the tear is a rumour now, a place where light changes its mind. "My father sold my contract to a touring company when I was fourteen, against a debt with the word honour in it. The first thing Antonia did when this house bought me out was give me my own copy of the accounts, every quarter, to keep. I cried over a balance sheet. Singers are not supposed to. It was that or the fish course, she said; the house has a policy about doing both at once."

"Everybody in this house has a policy," Marcus says. "It's like the Senate, with food."

"It's like the Senate," Daphne says, "with the women counting." It gets the room's laugh — Prima's too, unwilling, unfiled — and into it Barbatus puts his head round the door with a dry cloak over his arm and the expression of a man appointed by the weather.

"Young master. Rain's easing. Street's deciding." He looks at the sewing, the heir, the general constitutional position. "Mistress is doing the late round. She does it on feet like a tax audit. No noise until she's in a room, then the room owes her an explanation."

"I was just—" Marcus begins, and gets up, and discovers, standing, that he has been in the one dry cushion and Prima's stool has been taking a drip from somewhere in the old ceiling with the patience of a province. He looks at the damp flower-dark stain being made, stitch by stitch, irrelevant by her shoulder. "Your seat is wet. All this time. You might have said."

"I might have been offered," Prima says, to her needle, at her usual rates, "the dry one."

It is that sentence — its cadence, filed flat as a coin on a counter — that Antonia, doing her late round on feet like a tax audit, hears from the corridor with the towels for a different room entirely over one arm.

Antonia, coming in at that moment with dry towels for a guest who is not expected to be in her house at all during a committee investigation, hears her own cadence come out of a stranger's mouth — the dry, level understatement she has spent twenty years believing she invented out of necessity in Baiae, on stairs, under water jars. She stands in the doorway with the towels on her arm and the whole house, the rain, the lamps, performing their little conspiracy of ordinariness around her, and she thinks: No. Not yet. I have a house to lose first. One catastrophe in its proper order.

"Marcus Lentulus," she says, "your cloak is dripping on a mosaic older than your family's debts. Barbatus will lend you a dry one and the use of the back street, and if you love your sister as much as you love talking about her, you will be home before your absence becomes a second course. Prima, the rain is easing. Eirene will walk you to the crossing with a lantern. And Daphne —" she looks at the mended strap, the stitch that will not remember itself "— good. That is how all repairs should look. As if nothing were ever torn. We are none of us required to believe it."

Chapter Seven

Paper

. . .

Diomedes keeps three sets of books in three different hands, none of them his own. It is not dishonesty; it is calligraphy in the service of survival. There is the book for the tax office, upright and dull. There is the book for the house, in which the pastry cook's saffron and the enlargement of the kitchen stove stand in their true relations. And there is the book — tablets, actually, wax renewed each quarter so that some kinds of history melt as a matter of policy — in which Antonia's money goes out into Rome in the evening clothes of other men's names and comes home in the morning with interest.

The audit happens on the grey mornings, before the house has put its face on. Diomedes comes with the tablets under one arm and a stylus behind his ear — the stylus only; he has never in eleven years been known to put anything else there, having observed, early in their acquaintance, what Antonia does with remarks about it — and he reads the quarter back to her the way a priest reads entrails: without inflection, so that the future cannot be accused of being his idea.

The tax book first, because Rome comes first even in her kitchen. Registrations renewed. The aediles' compliment on her paperwork entered, deadpan, in the margin where Diomedes keeps remarks the tax office is welcome to read and unlikely to survive understanding. Wine licence. Lamp oil, a continuing scandal. The inspector's visit has left, as such visits do, a small fiscal bruise: a fee for re-inspection, a fee for the certificate attesting that the fee for re-inspection was paid, and a third sum, unlabelled in the upright hand, which Antonia eyes and Diomedes pretends is a smudge.

“The smudge is new,” she says.

“The smudge has a cousin in the aediles' office. It keeps the doorway to a width the committee can live with.”

She lets it stand. A house like hers pays for its drains twice: once to the men who dig them and once to the men who certify, in washed Latin, that the digging was decent. She has paid both since the two-table years and has the receipts in three hands. It is the undistinguished, quarterly heroism of her life, and nobody will ever carve it spiralling anywhere.

The house book next, and with it the empire in its true borders. Ammonius' saffron, defended like a frontier. The kitchen stove, enlarged in the autumn, now paying for itself in the rapid alkalis of banquet cookery — Diomedes has a column for this; Diomedes has a column for everything except, famously, the things he writes nothing down about. Daphne's contract at the new rate, Philomela's strongbox with the Greek, a payment for a midwife in the Subura entered as linen, extra, a payment to a lamp-seller's daughter entered as oil, festival, the whole female economy of her protection racket against Rome going past in code, at a walking pace, while the pastry cook argues with somebody's nephew in the yard about the density of almonds.

“You are aware,” Diomedes says, “that linen, extra now exceeds the house's actual linen.”

“I am aware that if the tax office ever learns to read women, Diomedes, we shall all be registered as linen. Proceed.”

Then the third book, which is not a book. The wax comes out of its cedar box with a smell of forests and old evenings. Here her money walks about the city in other men's names: a share of a grain barge, prudently sunk on paper while it floats in fact; a loan to a silversmith secured on plate the silversmith's wife believes is in Ostia; a mortgage on a dyer's vats in the name of a freedman who owes Antonia his freedom's paperwork and repays it in invisibility. The sums are good. The sums, this quarter, are better than good, the committee's cold wind having driven half the younger senatorial order indoors to borrow discreetly against expectations. War, she has observed before, is not the only thing that is good for business. Shame is excellent for it, provided the paperwork is sympathetic.

“The Greek sends a compliment,” Diomedes says, in the voice he keeps for weather in other countries. “He says madam's portfolio is the only one in his office that improves when Rome behaves badly. He says, if I may render the Greek, that you collect on the city's conscience.”

“The Greek flatters his depositors in their own languages. It is why his office is so quiet.” But she is listening. The Greek at the Basilica — Eutyches, which nobody calls him; Rome calls its bankers by their function the way it calls its emperors by their building programmes — has handled her serious money for eight years. He took it at first through a freedman's name, sniffed it like a coin, and within a year was suggesting, in the silences between items, that madam might prefer to hold certain paper in a form even her own bookkeeper should have to work for. It was Diomedes who worked for it, for three evenings, across the quarter's wax, following a Campanian estate's paper as it changed hands the way weather changes armies: from a dead man's executors to a syndicate, from the syndicate's patience to the Greek's strongbox, and from the strongbox, in slices, out again into the evening clothes of investors who must not be seen holding a senator's vintage.

One of the slices is hers. It became hers in the ordinary way — the Greek offered, Diomedes priced, the wax recorded — and it sat in the third set of books for a full quarter as money without a face, earning like furniture. Its identifying marks, estate agent's name, olive country, the shape of the surety, were visible to anyone who read the line whole. That it took Diomedes three evenings to read the line whole is, Antonia understands as he lays the tablet down, the real item in this morning's audit. He did not miss it. He followed it, the way he follows everything with her name hidden in it, to the bottom of the page, and then he decided, on his own authority, in the freemasonry of long service, to confirm it twice before he brought it up the stairs to a woman dressing her hair.

“You might,” Antonia says at last, “have brought it to me in the first quarter.”

“I might have brought madam a rumour in the first quarter. In the second I bring her a fact with the Greek's hand on it and the agent's seal under it.” He turns the tablet so that she can see, not the sum — she never looks at sums first; Diomedes taught her, or she taught Diomedes, it is no longer minuted which — but the names. “Money without a face I manage, madam. This has arrived at a face. It is the rule madam taught me.”

He looks at her hands, as clerks do, to see if she is ready to hold a stylus or only to listen. Her hands are in her hair. The damp on the courtyard wall has dried since January into the ghost of its Spanish map. Outside, the house is negotiating with a carter, and somewhere across the river a girl is counting stitches with her mouth open, neither of which facts is in any of the three books, in any of the three hands.

“You hold paper,” Diomedes says, on a grey morning when the damp has come through the courtyard wall in the shape, Eirene says, of Spain, “on the agent of an estate in Campania. It came to us through the Greek at the Basilica. It is good paper. Land, olives, a family's good name standing behind it like a guarantor at a wedding.”

Antonia is dressing her hair, which she still does herself on principle, another relic: a hairdresser's daughter does not sit idle in that particular chair for any woman living. “Whose good name?”

Diomedes, who can usually deliver any sentence as if it were a weather report, looks at the tablet as if it might revise itself. “The Cornelii Lentuli.”

The pins go in. One, two. Her hands do not ask her permission. “How much of it?”

“Enough that if we called it in the autumn, the olives would be ours by spring. We will not call it. The Greek advises holding. The family will find money — a marriage, an appointment. Families like that always find money eventually; it is lying around in their past like furniture.”

“And if the family does not find money? If the appointment — let us say a province, let us say the east — goes to another name because this name has become, through its own committee work, untidy?”

“Then the paper becomes land. Or it becomes an embarrassment we can sell to someone who collects embarrassments.” Diomedes closes the tablet. “I am telling you because you taught me to tell you everything with a face on it. Money without a face I manage. This has a face.”

Antonia looks at herself in the bronze mirror: a woman of thirty-eight with her hair going up correctly and a creditor's knowledge arriving, as the best weapons do, by post, unrequested, already paid for. For twenty years she has imagined — on stairs, in bad winters, in the years when the dining rooms were two tables and a debt to a lamp-seller — the instrument of revenge as something she would have to forge: a letter, a witness, a scene in a basilica with her voice carrying like a trumpet. Rome, being Rome, has delivered it instead as an investment. Lentulus is, through agents and Greeks and the sweet anonymity of paper, in debt to Antonia Cassia. His olives ripen toward her autumn. His son drinks in her house. His committee inspects her drains. The city has tied them together with its favourite knot, the one that looks like business and tightens like fate.

Eirene hears about it by noon, which is Diomedes' way of telling no one. She comes into the small dining room while Antonia is tasting a sauce that Ammonius has rebuilt for the second time that week out of spite and genius, and stands with a bowl of olives she has entirely forgotten to put down.

“His olives,” Eirene says. “In the ground. Ripening toward your autumn. Antonia. If a slave in the Subura house had prophesied that when we were seventeen, you'd have had her whipped for poetry.”

“I was nobody in the Subura house. I held mirrors. Poetry was above stairs.” Antonia sends the sauce back with a message consisting of one word, which the kitchen boy delivers as he delivers all such messages: at a run, for the sport of the return journey. “And they are not his olives. They are his grandfather's olives, technically. The Cornelii have always been technicians. It is why their debts are so well drafted."

Eirene sets the bowl down at last and eats an olive out of it, house privilege, thirty years in the accruing. "What will you do?"

It is the question. It has been the question since the mirror, going round under the morning's work like a song under a hallway: her singer's phrase, Daphne's disease, the tune under every room today. What she will do with it. The menu of doings is long and Diomedes has, tactfully, already priced it in the margins of his own mind. She could call the paper in the autumn, before the vintage, in a message routed through the Greek so deniable that Lentulus would learn of his creditor the way Rome learns of everything: in the baths, unattributed, at the exact moment it becomes unusable. She could sell the paper on, to a collector of embarrassments — there are two at the Basilica, Diomedes says, and a third in the Senate who collects nothing else and calls it public life. She could let it be known, in the invisible denominations, that the committee's chairman is mortgaged to the woman his committee inspected at dawn, and then watch Syria subside, in Acilius' phrase, like steam.

Or she could hold it. Holding is also a doing. Holding is the doing that women in her family have always done with the valuable and the unbearable alike: mirrors steady, ledgers closed, children — no. The thought is put down where the first catastrophe lives, uncounted. Hold the paper; take the interest quarterly; let his olives ripen toward her autumn and his marriage settlement ripen toward his; say nothing to the Greek, who will know anyway in his Greek's way, the way bankers know weather; and keep, in the box between the quarters, beside an unsigned note that taught her a phrase, the knowledge that once — for one quarter of one year, from a grey morning when the damp came through her wall in the shape of Spain — the arithmetic of twenty-one years balanced itself on paper, without her having to lift anything heavier than a stylus.

"I have imagined it wrong for twenty years," Antonia says, and is surprised to say it aloud, in a dining room, over olives. Eirene has that effect: thirty years of locked rooms in common will make a corridor of any woman. “I imagined a scene. A basilica, a letter. My voice carrying.” She looks at her hands, a hairdresser's daughter's hands, at thirty-eight still doing everything before she has decided. “I never imagined it arriving as yield.”

“Rome,” Eirene says, “is bringing everything to you as business these days. It is the house style. You invented it, love. In Baiae.” She says the place-name the way they both do: like a word in another language that they are, for professional reasons, fluent in and will not translate in front of the flowers. “If you call it in, you will get olives and a story. If you hold it, you will get interest and a longer story. I note, as your junior partner in catastrophe, that this house has always collected the longer story at the shorter rates.”

“The story has a girl in it across the river who counts,” Antonia says, so quietly that the room has to decide whether it heard. “Stories with girls in, Eirene, are not to be spent at the Greek's table. That is the whole of my policy. It is the whole of my religion, second service.”

Eirene does not refill the silence. She has kept Antonia's books in ways Diomedes never sees — the fourth set, unwritten, in the freemasonry of two women who were once entered, in a dead man's property, in the same column. After a moment she picks up the olives, remembers they are for a table, and goes to set them where guests will presently eat them without the slightest idea that they are dipping into a secured loan. It pleases her. Eirene's pleasures at forty are principally structural.

What Antonia does not say, then or later, to Eirene or to the mirror or to the third book's melting wax, is this: that holding the paper is the first revenge she has ever been offered that does not require anybody across a river to pay for it. The basilica scene, in the form she imagined it at seventeen on the stairs, had a cost column too, and the cost was never going to be billed to a Cornelius. Rome bills its scenes to women; it is a tax she has paid quarterly and knows by heart. Paper bills nobody. Paper just sits in a Greek's strongbox earning like furniture, while a man in the Senate discovers — at his own pace, in his own committees, with his wife scheduling the discovery between the oysters and the aqueducts — the exact rate of interest on a sentence accepted at twenty-four.

“Hold it,” she says to Diomedes, when he comes back for the tablets, in the level voice of the first book, upright and dull. And then, because the room is empty except for a bowl of olives with one missing and a clerk who has brought her a fact with a face on it across three evenings, she adds the rider that belongs in no book in any hand: “And if the olives do come to us in the autumn, Diomedes — I will not have them pressed in this house. Sell the oil forward. A woman's kitchen should not have to render her own metaphors.”

Diomedes bows over a joke that is not one and goes to write hold in a hand the Greek will read as investment advice.

“Hold it,” she says. “Say nothing to the Greek. And Diomedes—”

“Madam.”

“Find out what a fuller in Transtiberim named Vibius paid for his freedom, and when, and whether his household, nineteen or twenty years ago, received — a consideration. From Baiae. Discreetly is not the word. Find out as if you were buying thread.”

Diomedes is still for exactly one breath. He has kept her books for eleven years. He knows which questions have faces on them. “Thread,” he says, and writes nothing down, which in his system is the most serious form of record.

■

In the Basilica Julia, where the money-changers have set up their tables in the same relation to the law courts that remoras bear to sharks, Lentulus instructs his own agent in the music of delay. The banker — the same Greek, though Lentulus does not know the Greek's other client, because the Greek's whole fortune rests on no client knowing any other — is to be assured of the Syrian appointment as if it were a fact slightly too delicate for daylight. The Avidian negotiation is to be mentioned as all but concluded. A payment signifying intention will be made at the vintage. The agent, who has carried this family's intentions downhill for a decade, bows under the weight of them and goes to perform confidence in Greek.

The agent is called Soter. He is fifty, Greek in the way that has stopped being a nationality and become a profession, and he has carried the Cornelii's Campanian business since the old Gnaeus was alive to seal tablets and settle families. In the Basilica's crowd he does a thing that Lentulus, watching him arrive, has always found faintly shameful and wholly impressive: he becomes, without changing his clothes or his accent, exactly as Roman as the room requires and no more. To the money-changers he is a colleague. To the advocates wrangling in the aisles he is a client. To the Greek behind the cedar door he will shortly be, there is no other phrase for it, a remora's remora, feeding off a shark that feeds off the law.

“You are thin,” Lentulus says, because greeting a man of Soter's years with his health is the down payment on asking him to lie well.

“It is the season, dominus. Everyone's paper is thin before the vintage.” Soter looks over the hall with the eyes of a man reading weather off other men's shoulders. Two rows of tables away a young equestrian is weeping, quietly and with great self-control, into a contract; a money-changer is patting his hand with an intimacy that suggests the weeping, too, has been costed. “The Greek asks whether the payment at the vintage will signify.”

“The word I used?”

“The words we use travel, dominus. They are the only luggage that is never searched.” Soter says it without knowing he is quoting, at one remove and in a minor key, the doctrine of a house on the Caelian; the city is a single plumbing system, and ideas, like debts, arrive at addresses their authors never wrote. “He would prefer a sum. He has a Greek's superstition that sums signify intentions better than the word intention.”

Lentulus instructs him — the music of delay, orchestrated now at speaking length. Syria to be mentioned as a climate, not a claim. The Avidian match as a harbour in sight, with the pilot boat out. A payment at the vintage of a size Soter is to imply the Greek has already agreed, since nothing recruits a banker's agreement like the news that he has given it. Soter listens with his whole posture, a man loading cargo he expects to redistribute at sea.

"There is a question the Greek did not ask," he says at length, "which in his office is the expensive kind."

"Ask it for him. He charges me enough for the mail."

"Whether dominus's committee will be noisy." Soter lets the word stand in the Basilica's din like a cup set down carefully. "Paper dislikes noise, dominus. It is not a moral position. My cousin keeps the books for two of the syndicate that hold —" he corrects himself with the smoothness of a man stepping over a puddle he himself pointed out "— that hold an interest in the neighbourhood of dominus's estates. They read the notices of inspections the way farmers read clouds. A senator making weather over registered houses is, pardon the Greek, a change in the climate of his own security."

It lands, as things in the Basilica do, without ever being formally filed. Lentulus looks at his agent of ten years and sees, for a clear instant, the whole architecture from underneath: himself on the Senate benches drafting morality in period sentences, while below, in the money-changers' shade, his family's olives support a structure of paper held by men who price his speeches the way captains price a sky. He cannot tell Soter that the committee is personal. He cannot, either, any longer, quite tell himself it is policy. Both sentences are available, in the washed Latin his father issued him. Neither fits through the cedar door behind which the Greek is presently being Eutyches to nobody.

"Tell the Greek," he says at last, "that the committee will report generally. Twenty houses. A registry. It will be as interesting as a tax return, and for the same reason: it will be about everyone, in figures, with the names filed where figures keep them."

Soter bows. “Figures,” he says, “the Greek will accept. They are his poetry, dominus.” He does not know — the plumbing again, going uphill both ways across the city — that he has just returned, to the man it was invented about, a sentence minted at a grain merchant's dinner table and already spent by a woman over rebuilt fish sauce. He goes through the cedar door to perform confidence in Greek, and Lentulus is left in the Basilica's huge, echoing shade with the sensation he has had since the baths: of being read, accurately and in advance, by people whose books he is not permitted to see.

He does not go home by the short way. Senators of his order are supposed to be carried over their thoughts, in litters, like despatches; but it is a bright morning going grey at the edges, the kind that makes Rome look temporarily like a place where the past has been done and can now be walked through like a building. He walks. Clients find him even so — a former officer with a pension file, a freedwoman with a petition folded to the size of embarrassment who has clearly been told that this is the senator with the freedwoman's conscience, the secretaries' joke, working its way down to street level like a small coin through a market. He takes the petition himself, to Onesimus' visible filing of the irregularity. The woman's name is on it in a scribe's hand; under it, in pencil the Romans do not have and therefore in charcoal, which they do, she has made her mark: a cross, carefully, like a stitch counted twice.

“What does it ask?” he says, though he can read, because the forms require that the powerful be told things aloud by the powerless until both parties believe in the acoustics.

“That my late master’s son return my savings, dominus. He says they were the house's. The manumission says the savings were mine. Both papers are in Greek, dominus. I am in Latin.”

She says it without tears, with the humour of the street filing itself exactly. Lentulus stands in the Forum of Caesar with a freedwoman's charcoal cross under his thumb and the emperor's stone drums groaning toward their spiral behind her, and finds he has run out of committee language in the open air. “The Basilica will hear it,” he says. “I will see that it is heard by men who read Greek and Latin. It is the least the building can do. It has libraries in both, facing each other, like married people."

She bows as if a sum has been named, which in the currency that matters for the walk home, it has. Onesimus takes the petition and forgets it professionally into the family's real book, where a clerk at a side table writes who came, what they asked, what it will cost when it comes back — and everything comes back. Lentulus watches the column stone inch past on its rollers and thinks, with the part of him the Basilica has just read from underneath, that a man's name is spiral-cut exactly as deep as the debts he acknowledges, and no deeper, whatever the drums cost.

Walking home through the Forum of Caesar, Lentulus is overtaken by the emperor's works traffic: stone for the great column, blocks groaning on rollers, each drum already carved inside with its stair. A foreman tells the senator, unasked — the city tells senators things unasked; it is a tax on the broad stripe — that when it rises a man will be able to climb inside the war and come out on top of it. Lentulus stands a moment watching other men's history inch past on rollers. He thinks of his own name, spiral-cut somewhere between offices and olives, readable only from a distance no living Cornelius will ever stand at.

At home, Servilia has a letter from her brother about Cornelia and a face like a prepared speech. "The Avidii have named a figure."

"And?"

"It is a figure that pays the Greek and re-ropes the Palatine roof and allows your son to be twenty for two more years without consequences. In exchange they ask that the wedding be before the vintage, and that you speak for the father's petition about the harbour dues, and — this is the interesting clause, Lentulus, attend to it — that this family not be in the mouths of the city between now and the ceremony. Avidius used those words. He has bought his way out of the docks. He will not buy his way into a farce."

"So my committee must conclude."

“Your committee must conclude, your son must be invisible, and you must be a wall. Not a window.” She hands him her brother's letter like a verdict she has already appealed in private. “I do not say take them. I say this is the price of refusing them, itemised. You may now perform the Cornelian tradition of refusing at length and in excellent Latin, and in the autumn the Greek will perform the Greek tradition of owning our olives.”

He reads the letter. The figures are what figures are: an argument that has stopped pretending to be anything else. Somewhere in the house Cornelia is at her lesson; he can hear the lyre being corrected, note by note, by a man forbidden to touch her wrist. The sound comes through the walls the way light comes through shutters, in stripes. He thinks of the sealed tablet under his grandfather's mask, and of the possibility — he has never permitted it a whole thought; it arrives in stripes too — that what his father sealed was not about land at all, and that a man can inherit a debt that does not appear in any Greek's ledger because it is denominated in a currency bankers fear to touch.

Servilia does not wait for his answer to begin hers. This is a marriage's constitutional arrangement, arrived at over nineteen years and never minuted: he composes positions; she composes the correspondence by which positions discover they were decisions. She sits at the little table where the household accounts are reconciled — a table with more real power over Campanian olives than any bench in the Senate — and drafts to her brother in a hand that makes even refusals look like bookkeeping.

“Read it to me,” Lentulus says, from the window, where the light is failing in stripes.

“'We are sensible of the honour. The figure is a serious one, as a figure should be between houses who intend to be one. Gnaeus will wish to give his answer in person, as the connexion deserves; the vintage is a husbandman's deadline, not a father's, but we see no cause why goodwill should wait on grapes.'” She lays the stylus down in exact alignment with the tablet's edge, an act of government over a province still obeying her. “It agrees to everything except agreeing. Avidius will read it as a yes with manners. My brother will read it as a family keeping its price off the record. You may read it as a wall.”

“And Cornelia reads it as?”

“Cornelia does not read her own file, Lentulus. She sings in it.”

From beyond the garden wall, as if the house were cueing her, the lyre begins again: the lesson's second hour, the master's metaphors arriving fainter with the light. The figure corrects itself, begins again — the second way. She always takes the second way now. Servilia listens with her head a fraction turned, the way she listened, at the dedication, to an aunt itemising a marriage, and says, in the neutral voice she uses for provincial appointments and family earthquakes, “She asked me yesterday whether the Avidii keep musicians.”

Lentulus looks at her. “What did you tell her?”

“That ship-owners keep whatever a wife insists is ballast.” Servilia's face does its thorough nothing. “She said, 'Then I shall insist loudly.' Your daughter, husband, is composing her instructions to be disobeyed in. One does what one can with the material. You come of a family that chose its currencies for three hundred years. Perhaps she will be the generation that changes the money.”

It is as close to tenderness as this room permits before dinner. Outside, the household is assembling the evening in its order: clients' leavings cleared, the day-book shut with its futures inside, Marcus's absence reported in the formula — the young master is at the baths, a sentence which in this house now functions the way a payment signifying intention functions at the Basilica, as a climate rather than a fact. Servilia has already instructed the steward that if the young master is at the baths after dark for the third evening this week, the baths are to be sent, with the family's compliments, an invoice for his board. The steward, who is paid prospectively and in kindness, received this wit in complete silence and has docketed it, somewhere in the family's real epic, under the mistress knows.

“She knows about the Caelian evenings as she knows about the harbour dues,” Lentulus says, to the failing light, because there are sentences a man can only say to a window in his own house. “In outline. With the costings.”

“Cornelia,” Servilia says, “knows what every girl in a great house knows: the acoustics. We raise them inside the walls where men compose their intentions aloud, and then we are surprised at the quality of their information.” She sands the letter — an old-fashioned touch; Servilia distrusts modern blotting the way her husband distrusts the word steady for horses — and holds it a moment before sealing, weighing, as she weighs everything, the difference between what a thing is called and what it is. “Seal it tonight and you are a father accepting a figure. Seal it after the committee and you are a senator accepting a family. The Avidii will pay the same either way. That is the interesting clause, Lentulus. It is always the interesting clause: the sum is fixed; only the wording is still ours to spend.”

The lyre stops. A door in the garden side of the house performs its small announcement. Cornelia crosses the far end of the room's sightline with her music held like something rescued, not looking at her parents in business hours, per the fortifications — and her father, with his agent's warnings, his Greek's unasked questions and his olives ripening toward somebody's autumn all standing in him like clients in an atrium, does the most un-Cornelian thing available to him at the end of such a day: he leaves the letter unsealed on his wife's table, between the quarters of the household's accounts, and goes to stand for a moment where the music was.

“Tell your brother,” he says, “that we are honoured, and that I will give Avidius my answer after the committee reports.”

“When does the committee report?”

“The committee,” Lentulus says, with the exhausted accuracy of a man reading his own inscription, “reports when I tell it to. That has become, I gather, the problem.”

Chapter Eight

The Alexandrians

. . .

The banquet of Alexandrians has been booked since December, and like all Antonia's profitable evenings it rests on a lattice of small, unglamorous decisions: who is placed where the kitchen noise reaches least, which singer does Greek without making the Romans feel examined, what to serve men from Egypt who consider Roman cooking a promising provincial attempt. The great dining room has its new hanging, Prima's red flowers marching the border like a well-drilled cohort, and the lamps have been filled by a boy who has been threatened, kindly and specifically, about the consequences of a smoky wick.

The preparations began, as Ammonius insists all true history begins, with an insult delivered by a supplier. The Alexandrians' agent sent word at dawn that his principals preferred their fish in the Egyptian manner, a phrase that arrived in the kitchen like a declaration of war from a country Ammonius left thirty years ago and has been improving in exile ever since. He read the message twice, aloud, in the accents of a man defusing a siege engine.

“Egyptian manner,” he said to the kitchen at large. “I am an Egyptian. The manner is at home. Send back: the fish will be in the manner of this house, which has the advantage that this house is where they are eating it.”

“Send back also,” Antonia said, tasting the morning stock, “that the house has acquired, at some trouble, the little salted fish from the lake boats they praise in their letters home, and will serve it before the courses, without announcing it, so that they can discover home like a compliment and not like a curriculum.”

Ammonius bowed to the stockpot. Statecraft had occurred. This is the part of her empire nobody carves: a cook's honour managed at dawn so that a fleet contract can be managed at the third course. Rome is the mistress of the known world, says the inscription programme, and the known world, in Antonia's experience, is a set of small governances conducted over fish by people the inscriptions will not name.

By the sixth hour Diomedes has the seating in wax, and wax, as she told a young equestrian in another context, has carried Roman law for a thousand years. The head of the Alexandrian syndicate — Serapion, sixty, with a beard his Roman partners regard as a philosophy and he regards as a face — must not sit within negotiating distance of the tax farmer who foreclosed, two winters ago, on a cousin's warehouse in Ostia. The foreclosing tax farmer, Felix by name (the useful men again; it is a guild), must sit where he can see Serapion being civilised by other people's manners, because a man who watches his enemy fed at Antonia's prices tends to recalculate empires. The senator's nephew, who is decorative, connected, and — Diomedes has it in the second book, in a column headed in all but name cardiovascular — under doctor's orders that he treats as literature, is to be placed nearest the musicians and furthest from the undiluted wine, a geography Antonia designs without anyone's permission, out of a principle her house does not advertise: she does not let men kill themselves expensively in her rooms if the seating can help it. Free will is a guest's own affair. Geography is hers.

Prima's hanging went up at noon. She came herself to hang it, which is not in the commission and which Antonia permitted as she permits Daphne's second set: on principle, at a price, with the corners watched. Barbatus held the ladder. Prima, at the top of it among the red flowers, held pins in her mouth and directed, through them, a staff of serving boys with the unconscious authority of a girl whose whole life has been work nobody applauds. The boys obeyed her the way the kitchen obeys Ammonius: instantly, and with commentary reserved for later.

“Left,” Prima said, round the pins. “Your left. The one the goddess keeps her thumb on.” She caught Antonia watching from the doorway with a tradeswoman's gaze and did not startle, which Antonia noted. Girls who startle at being watched by power have been taught that the watching is the point. Prima has been taught that the work is. The hanging settled; the border marched; the room acquired, as rooms in this house do by design, the air of having been inevitable since Romulus.

“You'll spoil the effect standing there,” Eirene said, arriving with lamp oil on her hands and the day's intelligence in her face. “The room is supposed to look like nobody made it.”

“The room is supposed to look like Rome,” Antonia said. “Which is the same instruction. Let them sit down inside the work of women from three provinces and call it the natural order. We will charge the natural order by the course.”

The guests arrive as Alexandrians abroad always arrive: punctually, in numbers, with their own weather around them. There are interpreters who are not needed and secretaries who are, a physician travelling with Serapion who looks at the dining room the way Diomedes looks at accounts — professionally, for the places where trouble files itself — and a young man, Serapion's nephew and heir in every sense except the will, whose Latin is better than the Romans' Greek and whose manners, consequently, must do twice the work. He bows to Antonia low enough to honour the house and not low enough to insult his uncle. She returns the exact exchange rate.

“Your uncle's health,” she says. “His letter said the sea.”

“His letter says the sea every year, madam. It is his way of informing the sea that the arrangement continues.” The young man — Heron is his name; she files it with a harbour's usefulness — looks at the hanging the way his uncle will shortly look at the fish: as evidence. “The border is local work?”

“Transtiberim. The best light in Rome, and the women who sew in it can count.” She watches him take that in: a Roman hostess praising the far bank to an Alexandrian, both of them provincials in the capital's filing system, conducting diplomacy at the level where it actually happens. “Counting is underrated as a decorative art, Heron. Empires run on it and call the runners clerks.”

By the time the salted fish goes round — unannounced, discovered, received with the small, startled sound men make when a city they are visiting pronounces their childhood correctly — the room is hers in the way she likes rooms to be: not awed, not hers at all to look at, simply functioning at a temperature where agreement becomes possible. Serapion eats two of the little fish and does something with his face his beard was installed to prevent. “The lake at Canopus,” he says to nobody, and then, recovering the harbour wall of himself, to Avidius across the table: “Your hostess smuggles, Avidius.”

“Quality,” Avidius says, in the voice of a man reading his own best sentence back to himself, “is the only bribe that keeps giving evidence.” And looks at Antonia, and she at him, customs officer to cargo, while the courses begin to move like a fleet in line ahead.

The guests are merchants of the grain fleet and their Roman partners, and among the partners, inevitable as a harbour due, is Avidius the father. He eats in Antonia's house the way he buys cargo space, with an evaluator's love. “Your cook has improved the fish,” he tells her, which from Avidius is a love letter. “Last year it was ambition. This year it is fish.”

“I shall tell him. He will pretend to be insulted and raise his price.”

“You will pay it. Quality is the only bribe that keeps giving evidence in your favour.” He looks around the room; at the Senator's nephew holding a conversation with the singer Philomela about metre, at two tax farmers burying a partnership in the third course and resurrecting it by the fifth. “I am to marry my son into the Cornelii,” he says, in the tone of a man discussing the weather at sea. “If the Lentulus does not drown the match first, wrestling with your paperwork. Tell me, Antonia — you may; everyone else here is paid not to — will he?”

“He will do what his family has always done. He will discover, at the last moment, a principle that coincides with solvency.”

Avidius laughs, the deep harbour laugh. “You know him.”

“I know the type. Rome has a mould.” She moves to go, because a hostess who lingers is a hostess auditioning, but Avidius, who has spent forty years reading the moment cargo shifts, shifts his couch-weight almost imperceptibly into her path.

“Between ourselves,” he says. “I have made my money not frightening. I unloaded grain, my son unloads nothing heavier than a lyre, my grandson will unload provinces. It requires that nothing with my name on it be laughed at in the baths. If your house and his committee are going to make my family's wedding into a mime, I would rather buy a different old name. There are several for sale, though they call the shop something else.”

“Then tell him so.”

“I have. In a letter about figures. Men of his mould only read figures. It is their poetry.” Avidius takes an olive. “You hold paper, I am told, in several directions at once. It is a talent. Paper is the only freedman who never forgets his place, because his place is wherever you file him.”

She looks at him then, really looks, the customs officer at the cargo, and Avidius — who respects competence the way priests respect omens — inclines his head the smallest degree a rich man can manage without spraining anything. Nothing has been said. Everything has been invoiced.

Philomela sings after the second course, Greek first, as commissioned — a drinking song from Lesbos that has survived three centuries of symposia by being about exactly what is happening in the room, viz. men making treaties with their cups raised. She sings it straight, without the vocal embroidery Romans pay extra for and Greeks apologise for, and Serapion beats time once on the table edge with a knuckle, a harbour signal of approval, and then remembers his beard and stops.

It is in the pause — musicians retuning, plates moving like weather systems, the wine doing the slow work wine does on geography, softening the borders Antonia drew in wax at the sixth hour — that the senator's nephew gets Philomela into the conversation about metre. He is called Gaius Calpurnius; he is thirty; he has, besides the heart reported to his wife and the doctor's literature, a love of verse that his family treats as a minor and picturesque disease, like an allergy to shellfish. He writes elegiacs. Rome is full of this condition. He wants to know whether Philomela finds the hexameter breathable, a word he has brought to the dinner like a new knife.

“Everything is breathable,” Philomela says, “if the singer is allowed to breathe. Your poets write for the eye now, Gaius Calpurnius. The eye doesn't have lungs. It is why their epics need buckets.”

This goes through the room's musically literate like a wire through cheese. Somewhere a poet of Antonia's acquaintance — present tonight as garnish; she hires them by the evening in the slack season, for conversation, at rates that would make the door-book blush — decides to have heard it as a compliment to the bucket and drinks. Calpurnius laughs, genuinely, a big, unguarded sound that reorganises his face into the one his wife presumably married. He is enjoying himself. This is the fact about the evening the versions will later drop, the way versions drop ballast: the man was happy, in a room full of people exercising their best professional selves, arguing about breathing with a singer from Corinth who treated his hobby like a trade.

“You should set something of mine,” he says. “A short thing. For a real voice. My uncle says it would be founding a dynasty in the wrong art.”

“Bring the short thing to the house on a morning,” Philomela says, “and I will tell you if it breathes. Singers are the customs officers of poetry, Gaius Calpurnius. Most of it is smuggled. The rest is ballast.”

Across the room the tax farmers are on their fifth course and their second partnership. The first one died over the fish (a spoilage clause; Felix the tax farmer believes in writing spoilage down until it confesses; his partner, a lean man from Brundisium with a smile like a contract's fine print, believes spoilage, like gratitude, is improved by leaving it unminuted). Now Heron joins them with the fleet's winter figures in his head and no paper anywhere about his person — Alexandrian style, which Diomedes, observing from the serving door with a colleague's respect, describes later as carrying the books behind the eyes, like madam — and the partnership resurrects itself between the boar and the little cakes, in language so approximate that only the men who will profit by it understand a word, which in Rome is the definition of a binding agreement.

Antonia, doing her circuit, hears Serapion tell Avidius a story about a harbour tax in Alexandria and a priest of Serapis who attempted to collect it twice, once for the city and once for the god, on the grounds that the god's share had been omitted since the Ptolemies. It is a story with a long, dishonest preamble, and Avidius is enjoying it the way harbour men enjoy weather they are not currently in. The story's architecture requires — Serapion is an artist; the beard is a curtain, and it rises — that the priest produce from the temple archives a receipt, forged by his grandfather, witnessed by a crocodile. The room starts to gather the way rooms gather around warmth. The musicians have stopped tuning. Even Ammonius, presenting in person a sauce he has rebuilt from a first version Antonia returned with the single word again, pauses in the doorway with the dish like an offering left too long at a shrine, unwilling to break the story's surface.

“And the collector,” Serapion says, arriving at the part he has clearly been sailing toward since the fish, “examines the receipt. He examines the witness. The witness —” the beard performs a small, grave undulation, “— examines him.”

The laugh goes up where he put it: Apicius would have timed a sauce by it. Avidius laughs like a harbour in a gale. The tax farmers laugh in their newly resurrected partnership, at the same rate, as a clause. And Gaius Calpurnius, who has been waiting all evening, it appears, for a story in which the paperwork is witnessed by a crocodile — a man who writes elegiacs about breath, whose doctor has written literature about his heart, whose wife two streets away is at that moment telling her sister that these Alexandrian dinners run late and his colour has been better at home all week — Gaius Calpurnius laughs last and longest, with his whole unguarded face, in the interval between courses, while Philomela beside his couch is still smiling, and Antonia at the far end of the room is turning toward the sound with the expression of a woman whose seating geography has done everything it can.

The fleet comes up with the boar, as it was always going to. All evening the grain ships of Alexandria have been sailing in the room's ballast — tonnage under the talk of fish, winter weather under the music — and with the third course Serapion brings them formally to anchor.

“The prefect of Egypt will want the sailings early this year,” he says, in the tone of a man discussing the weather at sea, which in his family is the weather at sea. “There is talk in the Canopic quarter of stores for an eastern movement. Grain follows talk the way gulls follow offal. It does not ask the talk's credentials.”

“Eastern movement,” Avidius says, tasting the phrase the way he tasted Ammonius' rebuilt sauce: carefully, and with the intention of having it again at his own prices. “The emperor's east is a rumour with a staff.”

“Most staffs begin as rumours. It is how they avoid the winter sailings.” Heron, who has the figures behind his eyes, lays them out on the table between the cups without paper: hulls available, hulls promised, the harbour dues at Ostia sitting in the middle of the numbers like a reef everyone at the table has hit in a different season. Antonia, on her circuit, hears the reef get its name — the same dues her landlord's agent, her husband-that-never-was, her whole triangle of paper and committee, have lately been navigating — and hears Avidius say, with the mildness of a man reading figures, which are his poetry, “A senator of my acquaintance will speak to the dues this year. Family reasons.”

The room does not pause. Rooms in her house are trained. But Diomedes, at the serving door, makes a note in the darkness behind his eyes to match Heron's, and Antonia files Avidius' sentence where she files all sentences that arrive with their price already worked out: between the quarters. A wedding for a harbour due. A committee concluded for a wedding. Paper in several directions at once. She has seldom been prouder of the seating: Serapion on one flank, the tax farmer watching his enemy civilised, the senator's nephew breathing hexameters by the musicians, and in the middle distance her own hostess's body, circulating like good coin, while the empire's breakfast next winter is arranged over boar.

“Your boar is from Hispania,” Serapion says to her, as she passes. It is not a question. In Alexandria men identify pork the way Romans identify accents: as intelligence.

“From a man outside Tarraco who owes the Greek at the Basilica an apology and expresses it quarterly in meat. Quality is the only apology that keeps giving evidence.”

Avidius laughs before he can file it. “She steals, Serapion. In front of witnesses. It is why the house is full.”

“I recycle,” Antonia says. “In this city everything has been somewhere else first. That is the dedication we're all performing.”

She says it lightly, for the table, and moves on; but Serapion's eyes follow her the length of the room with the expression of a customs officer who has just watched cargo volunteer its own manifest. Later — much later, in the baths version, where the evening will be misfiled under a death like a letter under a stone — men will remember the food and the singing and the terrible minute in the interval. Nobody will remember that the winter fleet was priced over the boar, and the harbour dues traded for a wedding, and a widow-maker of a story loaded by a bearded man from the Canopic quarter, all in the same twenty minutes, in a room hung with two hundred red flowers sewn by a girl across the river whose name the register will now never spell. That is not because the minute swallowed the evening. It is because the evening, like all Antonia's profitable ones, was a lattice of small, unglamorous decisions, and Rome has never known how to invoice a lattice. It can only carve the part that falls down.

Serapion has brought with him from Alexandria a small climate of his own: brighter cloth, slower vowels, and a way of discussing money as if it were weather with responsibilities. He is in the office with the Greek's subordinate, going over freight for a cargo that includes wine, linen and—because Alexandria cannot resist sending Rome a metaphor—papyrus in quantities that would keep committees from silence for a decade.

"Your city imports arguments," Serapion says, "and exports instructions for holding them."

Antonia, who is checking the wine before it acquires a reputation in her cellar, says, "Your city exports both. We merely add taxes in transit."

Philomela has been summoned not to sing but to listen, a professional refinement that startles some of the younger men. An Alexandrian musician in Serapion's party has lately taken to setting Greek verses with a pause before the final noun, "so the room can appreciate the expense," he explains. Philomela hears him through once. "The expense is stealing the noun's entrance."

"You disapprove?"

"I harmonise. It is more dangerous."

She gives him the line back with the pause shortened and the last word allowed to arrive like a person whose fee has been paid in advance. Serapion looks towards Antonia as if a cargo had shifted into better trim.

"She is expensive," Antonia says helpfully.

"Most accuracy is."

Diomedes is copying figures at a rate that suggests the figures fear him. A young Alexandrian clerk, keen to show metropolitan technique, has used a term for demurrage that Diomedes renders into Latin as the price of keeping ships waiting while men find adjectives.

"That is not the term," the clerk says.

"It is the meaning. The term may join it when it is sober."

There is business in all this, but there is also the slower import Rome rarely declares: a different idea of women's money. In Alexandria, Serapion tells them, his sister owns shares in a warehouse and litigates in her own voice through a Secretary who has learned to take dictation without making it sound like pregnancy. The room receives this as it receives sauces from abroad, with interest and a suspicion that Rome could do it more importantly.

“Would she sing?” Philomela asks.

“She would invoice.”

“Then we are colleagues by another harbour.”

Antonia makes no speech. She enters the wine, appreciates the papyrus and watches Philomela correct the pause in a stranger’s song. Empire, when it works at all, is often no grander than this: somebody from elsewhere showing a room where its own drains might run clearer.

■

It is the senator's nephew who dies. Later there will be versions — the house will accumulate versions the way the Tiber accumulates offerings — but the version Antonia keeps, the housekeeping version, is this: a man of thirty, overweight, over-wined, with a heart his physician had already described to his wife in the words physicians use for a roof in a bad street, laughing at a story in the interval between courses; a choke that was not a choke; Philomela, who has presence of mind the way other singers have jewellery, getting him upright and calling for the physician who lives two streets away and dines, on Antonia's standing arrangement, with one ear open; the physician arriving fast and working competently and the man's colour deciding, as colour does, to leave anyway, all of it over in less time than the kitchen needs to ruin a sauce.

A death in a house like hers is not a tragedy first. It is a legal shape first, and a rumour immediately after, and a tragedy — for a wife two streets away is receiving the news from Barbatus, who has taken off his door-keeper's face and put on the human one he keeps for such errands — in its proper place, which is everywhere and therefore nowhere the aediles can measure.

Antonia does the things. She has rehearsed the things the way ships rehearse fire. The room is cleared without panic. The other guests are given cloaks and discretion and the back street in ones and twos, with the bill forgotten by policy and remembered by gratitude. The body is laid in the small courtyard room, decently, with a coin and clean linen, and no one, no one, is permitted to say the word poison within the walls, because words are seeds and this house will not garden its own ruin. Diomedes writes the evening down while it is still warm: who was present, what was served, the hour, the physician's name, the sequence, in the upright dull hand of the tax book, because truth, to survive in Rome, must learn to look boring on paper.

Avidius is among the last to leave. At the door he says, "You run a tight ship in a storm."

"It was not a storm. It was a man laughing, with a bad heart, in a city that feeds men like him for thirty years and then blames the room he dies in."

"All the same." He puts on his cloak. "The Lentulus committee will not call it that. Mind your paperwork, Antonia. And mind who profited from a death in your house this quarter. Sometimes a thing is an accident with excellent timing, and sometimes—" he shrugs, a harbourman's shrug, philosophical and entirely sincere "—sometimes the timing is the accident's employer."

Barbatus goes to the widow the way he once went into arenas: without anything in his hands. It is a policy he and Antonia arrived at years ago, after a death in another house, in the two-table years — a drowned boatman, fished out by the house's people on a winter morning, with the news to be carried to a wife in a street off the cattle market. Hands empty, face his own, the facts in the order of the evening. The widow of Gaius Calpurnius keeps him standing — senators' families keep everyone standing; it is a kind of architecture — and asks the questions wives of her order are not supposed to know how to ask, in the order her grief supplies rather than her rank: did he suffer, was he alone, who held him, what had he eaten, had he laughed. Barbatus answers them all, including the one inside the others, which he has heard before in other houses and other registers, was he with a woman, without the words ever being put into the street between them.

“A room of witnesses, domina. Twenty men and the musicians. The singer had his shoulders. There wasn't time to be alone. That's the house's word and it'll be the physician's, in better Latin.”

She looks at the big freedman doorkeeper delivering better Latin's advance guard in her hall at midnight, and what her face does then Barbatus will report to the night porter, much later, as a fight only in the technical sense: something taken on the chin, absorbed, no falling. “He would have liked the witnesses,” she says, and cries, after, with the efficiency of a person opening shutters, while her household deploys around her and her sister starts, already, the list that Rome starts: the uncle to be told first, the will, the mourning that must not look bought. Barbatus withdraws backwards a pace, the way men leave shrines, and is given at the door — by a steward in a panic of good management — a purse for his trouble, which he refuses with a formula Antonia taught him for these errands: the house doesn't charge for the carrying, dominus; only for the dinners.

In the small courtyard room, meanwhile, the physician writes. He is Antonia's tableware physician — Nikias, Greek, fifty, with a practice built out of rich men's dinners and poor women's childbeds, which he maintains in that order so that the first pays for the second and neither knows it is being governed, a man after Diomedes' own heart — and he writes the evening in the order of the evening before anyone in this story will coin the phrase: the hour, the course, the laughter, the colour going like a tide going out where a child has dug a channel, the measures taken, the measures irrelevant. He signs it. He seals it in front of Diomedes and the Alexandrians' travelling physician, who had been at the table with his own counsel's eye on the room and who now adds, unasked and at cost of some professional weather across his face, a second signature to the Greek copy.

“Two physicians,” Nikias says to Antonia, in the corridor, washing his hands in a basin a boy holds as if it were evidence, “agreeing in writing. It happens in Rome perhaps once a reign. Frame the phenomenon.”

“You'll deposit it at dawn.”

“I shall deposit it at dawn, buy fish, and tell three dinners tonight's story with the names filed off, so that by noon the truth has a head start in a false beard. It is the immunisation we have.” He dries his hands on a cloth of Prima's work without knowing it — everything in this house is somebody's work, being used as itself — and looks at her with the directness men of his trade are licensed for. “It was his heart, Antonia. It was his heart last year and it would have been his heart at a temple feast, with the omens excellent and the priests all looking the other way. Your seating did what seating can.”

“Seating,” she says, “is not among the causes the committee will list.”

“No,” Nikias says. “For that you have paper, and witnesses, and a singer who held his shoulders instead of the note. Hold your paper the way you hold everything, madam: quarterly, and in more hands than yours.”

The Alexandrians are the last to go besides Avidius. Serapion at the door stops and looks back at the emptied dining room — couches stripped, the hanging's red border marching over a field suddenly gone quiet, serving boys moving like a tide going out — and does the thing his Roman partners will retell at baths until it becomes, like all their truths, a kind of cargo. He takes off a ring. Not an heirloom: a working ring, harbour gold, worn smooth. “For the singer,” he says, “who held the man. Not payment. In Alexandria we have a word for money that is not payment and it takes a philosopher to spend it. Give it to her with my house's name filed off.”

Antonia puts it — she does not entrust it to the night's confusion of trays — in the box in Diomedes' office, Guests' Property, Forgotten, on top of the evening's other arrested tides: a cloak clasp, a Greek secretary's stylus, someone's luck-piece on a cord. The box is getting to be a museum of the city's lowered guard. Tomorrow claimants will come at dusk in panics of discretion. The ring will wait a day, by her decision, so that when Philomela receives it the giving has cooled into record, and no one, in any inquiry anyone is composing, can file it under the price of a woman's statement.

Philomela is in the musicians' room with her lyre across her knees like a child she is not holding for comfort. “He asked if the hexameter breathes,” she says, to Antonia, to the room, to the colleague tuning in the corner who knows better than to be in this conversation. “I should have given him a duller answer.”

“You gave him the true one. It is the house speciality. We charge by the course.” Antonia sits — in this room, at this hour, sitting is a message the staff read correctly: the emergency is over; the night is now merely terrible — and puts her hands flat on her own knees the way she tests walls. “Tomorrow men will ask you questions in an order designed to make the evening into other evenings. Tell it as it happened. The fish, the metre, the story, the laugh. In that order. If a question arrives from the wrong end, walk it back to the fish.”

“Is that a technique?”

“It is a life,” Antonia says. “The technique is just its paperwork.” She rises; the room reassembles; somewhere a boy is crying in the kitchen because death has been in the building and he is eleven and his mother apprenticed him for arithmetic, and Ammonius is finding out loud, in Alexandrian Greek of the first quality, whether pastry is spoken anywhere in the theology of the moment.

She stands in the doorway after he has gone, in the smell of lamp oil and cooling food, and listens to her house performing its grief procedures: low voices, water, linen. Eirene comes to stand beside her without touching her, which is how they touch.

Diomedes finishes the evening's writing in the small hours, in a house that has gone the particular quiet of buildings where somebody has died between courses. He enters the Alexandrians' booking as fulfilled, the wine as served, the staff as paid for a short night at the long rate, because Antonia, in the corridor an hour ago, said full rate in the tone of a woman settling with the gods in a currency she controls. He enters the ring, temporarily, under guests' property, forgotten, which is not yet true, and will be by morning, and is the truest description of most things entrusted to paper. Then, in the second book, in the hand for facts that must survive fashion, he writes the name of Gaius Calpurnius, the hour, and — after a pause during which the stylus does not move, a toll-gate in the night — the words died laughing, which no tax office requires and no committee will know how to file.

"Second catastrophe," Antonia says. "In its proper order."

"What was the first?"

"I am not counting those yet either."

Chapter Nine

An Inquiry

. . .

A death in a dining house belongs, by the city's old and flexible anatomy, to several jurisdictions at once, which means it belongs to whoever moves first with the best Latin. By the second hour of the morning the dead man's uncle the senator has written to the urban prefect; by the third, Antonia's physician has deposited, at her instruction, a sealed account with a notary she has paid for years precisely against the day someone's heart would table a motion. By noon the baths have decided that the man was poisoned by a rival for a singer's favours, cuckolded by a tax farmer and carried out singing, three deaths, all false, all immortal. Rome does not mind an inquiry. Rome minds having nothing to say while it proceeds.

The uncle's letter is the first to move because grief, in senatorial families, keeps office hours. He writes to the prefect before the body is cold in its own house — the body having been conveyed home at dawn under Barbatus' direction, in a procession so discreet it was indistinguishable, from any window that mattered, from a delivery of wine. The letter does not accuse. Accusation is for men who can afford to be wrong in public. The letter deplores and requests, in the washed vocabulary, in view of certain committees currently sitting, that the prefect satisfy himself, and invites the city, by implication read in every atrium by the second hour, to watch the prefect satisfying himself at a particular address on the Caelian.

The prefect, who is a man of the new school — which in AD 112 means a man who has realised that Trajan's Rome runs on paperwork the way the old Rome ran on omens, and with the same priesthood — reads the letter twice and sends, not men, but a note, to three addresses. To the aediles: has the house a history? To the tax office: is the house in order?

To his own senior clerk, a freedman with a memory like Diomedes' third book: who ate there? The answers arrive before the uncle's second letter, which is how a prefect demonstrates that he is not influenced by committees. He is influenced by filing. It is a more durable vice.

Meanwhile, on the Caelian, Antonia is conducting the morning after a death in the house the way she conducts everything: by sections, lit from the back. The great dining room is cleaned by her own instruction twice, once for decency and once for the record, so that any man inspecting it shall find, boringly, a room. The couches are re-covered. The hanging — Prima's border marching over last night's geography — she orders left exactly as it was.

“Take it down,” Eirene says, “and it looks like evidence. Leave it up—”

“Leave it up and it looks like Tuesday. A house that redecorates over a death has written its own evidence. We are a dining house, Eirene. Dining houses are allowed Tuesdays.”

The staff are briefed in the kitchen, standing, with Ammonius' fires lit behind them and the boy who cried in the night given, by Antonia personally, a task involving water and distance from the great room. She tells them the order of the evening — she used the phrase before she received it; the house will never know which of them coined it, and the not knowing is the closest the phrase will ever come to a wedding present — and she tells them the rule beneath it: answer what is asked, add nothing that gleams, and if a question arrives wearing tomorrow's clothes, walk it back to the fish. Barbatus, who has given statements to arena officials in two reigns, nods like a man recognising a formation.

“Fish first,” he says to the boy, kindly, as to a recruit. “Then the song. Then the story. Then the laugh. Anything asks you different, it's not a question, it's a door. Don't go through doors other people hold open, in inquiries or in life.”

Philomela is the one Antonia keeps back. The singer has been awake since the fifth hour with her hair still dressed for last night, a state in which, Diomedes will record, she resembles a temple after a festival:

garlanded, exhausted and smelling of oil. She has Nikias' Greek copy of the night's statement in her lap and is reading it with a singer's lips, learning it the way she learns a programme.

“Don't learn it,” Antonia says.

“I was at the couch. I had his shoulders.” Philomela looks up. The famous self-possession is on her face like makeup applied by another hand. “If I don't learn it, I'll sing it, Antonia. It'll come out arranged. Everything comes out of me arranged. It is the whole disease.”

“Then arrange it in the order it happened. That is all learning is.” Antonia takes the copy, not unkindly, and puts it under a bowl, where paper in this house goes to become less important. “You sang. He spoke about metre. Serapion told a story with a crocodile for a witness. The man laughed. You held him up. Nikias came at a run and was a physician for four minutes against a heart that had filed its resignation last year. That is the whole of your evidence, Philomela. It has the great merit of being true at the speed it occurred.”

“And if they ask whether he was — in love with me, let's say it in their Latin — or I with his uncle's money, or whether the song was the Greek one, for people who know?”

“Then the question has arrived from the wrong end, and you walk it back to the fish.” Antonia meets her eyes, freedwoman to freeborn Corinthian, across every column Rome keeps. “You are registered, your papers are boring, your money is with a Greek who would adopt a tax return before he'd open your strongbox to a committee. You are the cleanest witness in Rome today, Philomela. Behave like a tax receipt and no one can make a song of you without showing their own handwriting.”

The singer laughs — once, unwillingly, and the laugh does what laughs do in this house's mornings, which is recruit the kitchen to normality. Below the talk, the day assembles: Diomedes' tablets in three hands, Nikias' sealed account gone at dawn to a notary who has been being paid for years against precisely this light, Ammonius baking, out of defiance and almonds, at a rate the morning cannot justify. By the third hour the baths have their three deaths, all false, all immortal. The house has one, true, and written down while it was still warm. Antonia, who knows Rome, settles herself to watch which of the four arrives at the prefect's office with a seal on it.

Lentulus receives the news at his clients' hour, in the mouth of a freedman who brings petitions and relishes disaster the way pastry cooks relish saffron: professionally, and more than he admits. He dismisses the man mid-flourish. He stands in his own atrium among the masks with the information arranging itself in him like troops: his committee, her house, a corpse, the city's tongue. He is aware — he will be able to date the awareness later, to this minute, to the quality of light through the compluvium — of a feeling he cannot at first name because it has arrived wearing the wrong uniform. It is not satisfaction. It has the shape of its opposite, hurrying.

Servilia, who has also heard — Servilia hears everything at the speed other people take to decide whether to repeat it — says from the doorway, “Do not go there.”

“I have no intention of going there.”

“You have every intention of being the man Rome watches not going there. It amounts.” She comes into the room. “If you press this now, you will look like a creditor applauding a fire. If you defend her, you will look like—” She stops, not for want of the word.

“Like a man who inspects a house at dawn and eulogises it by noon.”

“Like its patron,” Servilia says, with surgical calm. “The Avidii will read it. The emperor's secretaries will read it. Your daughter, Lentulus, will read it, in the faces at dinner for the rest of her unmarried life.”

“So I am to let the prefect's men establish whether a man died of his heart or of her fish, and my committee is to master the antiquarian skill of silence.”

“You are to let the truth be established by men who do not love or hate in that street. It is a short list. The physician is on it, I understand, because she had the foresight to employ him before she needed him. There is a lesson in that for families who arrange their credit after the vintage.”

Marcus comes in then, as his family would say, by the garden side, which is the household's phrase for entering a conversation after every door for it has been formally closed. He has clearly been at the baths — the other baths, the early, functional ones where news is beaten like laundry — and he has the first, unwashed version of the story all over his face.

“They say he was poisoned,” he says. “In the fish. By the Alexandrians, because of the fleet contract. There's also one where Daphne poisoned him for a necklace.” He gets the last word out and hears, as young men do a beat late, whose necklace that is in every sense that matters. “Those are the baths' versions. I thought the house should — I thought somebody here should know what the—”

“The house knows what the baths will say, Marcus,” his mother says. “The house is presently deciding what its head will say in the Senate, which is a related but more expensive plumbing system.” She looks at her son the way she looks at a room being set for a dinner that will now require reseating. “You know this singer they're decorating with poison. Will she hold?”

The question lands on Marcus like a hand on a shoulder in the baths. He has been managed by his mother since before he could decline the noun, but he has never been briefed by her — asked, as an asset rather than scolded as a liability — and the novelty makes him, for once, precise. “She returned a necklace someone gave her because it was glass,” he says, to the room, missing nobody. “She keeps her accounts quarterly. She asked me once whether my father really believed registries protect women or only families, and then sang the Greek one, so I wouldn't have to answer in that order. She'll hold, Mother. She's cleaner than the committee.”

“Then we do nothing, loudly,” Servilia says, before her husband can promote the observation into a family injury. “Lentulus. Attend to the optics as you would attend to a harbour due. The committee does not meet this week. A meeting postponed for the prefect's convenience is statesmanship. A meeting held tomorrow is a prosecution of a corpse's dinner."

"Postumus will say—"

"Postumus will say whatever he says to you in porticoes, and then he will say the opposite to Acilius in a warmer room, and both will be called opinion. Let him. The Avidii are the readership that matters this season, and Avidius was there, husband. He ate the fish. He watched your inspected house produce a physician, two sealed statements and a widow's errand run with empty hands before the lamps were trimmed. Do you imagine a man who unloaded grain does not price seamanship in a squall? He will be telling his son by Thursday that whatever else the Cornelii are entangled with on the Caelian, it is competently crewed. You cannot buy that paragraph, Lentulus, and if you press the inquiry you will personally set fire to it at the harbour mouth."

It is a general's briefing, and like all her briefings it leaves Lentulus in command of exactly the ground she has chosen. He looks at Marcus — at twenty being briefed by his mother in front of his father, standing very straight the way boys do when a household suddenly shows them the machinery — and does an unfamiliar thing. He includes him.

"You heard this where Daphne sings, or where Rome bathes?"

"Both, Father. The baths had the poison before the water was hot. The house — the Caelian had the physician's version at dawn and nobody was selling it. That's what made the baths angry, I think. A story nobody's selling."

"An unpriced commodity," Servilia says, "in a city of auctioneers. Yes. That would anger the baths." She rises; the room rearranges itself around her standing the way rooms do around Antonia's on the other hill, which neither woman would thank a narrator for observing in company. "Write to Postumus cancelling Thursday with a compliment to the prefect's industry. Write to nobody about the house. If Acilius asks at the baths what the committee intends, the committee intends to be general, eventual and dull. And you, Marcus, will not be seen within two streets of the Caelian until the prefect has filed his dullness, not because you are guilty of anything except a necklace, but because grief in this city is a theatre with a long run and I will not have this family heckling from the cheap seats."

Marcus bows — correctly, uniquely, without the slam his family uses instead — and goes out by the garden side of his life. Lentulus watches him go and says, to the masks, to the prepared speech of a face his wife retains for household earthquakes, "He has started to answer in the order of the evening."

"Has he."

"The baths first. Then the house. Then what it means. No boy of this family has ever arrived at meaning last. We breed for the peroration."

Servilia, at the door, considers her husband with the attention she gave, long ago, to a sentence about Baiae dropped into a conversation about oysters. "Then somebody is educating your son, Lentulus," she says, "in a street where you and I do not love or hate within the prefect's hearing. Let us be grateful the tuition has so far been in manners. It is more than the tutors achieved at the same rates."

She goes. The masks remain. Lentulus looks up at his grandfather — Gnaeus, naturally, the dented-mirror Gnaeus, under whose cupboard a sealed tablet has been ripening for nine years — and has the clearest thought of his morning, the kind a man buries standing up: If I open it, it is because a man has died at her table. Everything in this family requires a death to become sayable.

He does not open it. He sends, instead, an unsigned note by a slave who is not his usual messenger, which is the most signature-like act available to a Cornelius: Keep the physician's account sealed until the prefect asks. Answer in the order of the evening, not the order of the questions.

It is good advice. It is also, and he knows it before the slave has left the street, the first unpaid thing he has done for Antonia Cassia in twenty-one years, and it sits in him for the rest of the day like a coin swallowed in childhood: unnoticed by the world, impossible to forget the swallowing of.

Before any formal question can be answered, the documents are made to answer one another. Diomedes lays out the household copies in the office: receipts, fees, contracts, the Greek's extracts in their careful boredom, a list of musicians paid on dates that can stand up in court without blushing. Philomela, whose curiosity has never learned to sit outside with the carriages, reads the first copy over his shoulder and says, "We look like a very well-run rumour."

"That," Diomedes says, "is the object of the exercise."

Antonia has barred Eirene from giving evidence in metaphors and Daphne from giving it in song. Barbatus is permitted to be present because his silence, properly aimed, has the force of a locked gate. The inquiry wants names. Diomedes gives it categories, dates and initials in precisely the quantities the forms have room for. It is a lesson in how a narrow column can defend a house better than a broad speech.

When the clerk asks whether women are detained against departure by debts, Philomela—who has been asked merely to identify a payment—looks up from the schedule with an expression no harmony can soften.

"Debts are entered," she says. "So are doors."

The clerk, who is young and maintains a brave little beard on behalf of jurisprudence, writes this down and then crosses it out as unhelpful. Antonia makes no sign. The crossing-out pleases her more than the sentence would have in evidence; it proves the phrase has travelled into an office and made a man use a second thought with his own hand.

At the interval, in a corridor that smells of cedar and other people's wet cloaks, Diomedes gives the women water and the house's instructions in their second form: say only what your copy can survive. "If asked about happiness," he says, "request a definition."

"What if asked about madam?" says Philomela.

"Ask whether they have brought enough paper."

Even Barbatus smiles. It is one of the reasons inquiries dislike working through lunch. Office light has a way of making institutions smaller and people legible. Antonia stands at the end of the corridor with her hands folded and feels, not triumph, but the beginnings of a different weather: her house no longer needs to be interesting to be defensible. It needs to be readable on her own terms, one exact page at a time.

■

The prefect's men are correct, which Antonia prefers; malice she can price, correctness she can plan around. They view the dining room. They view the kitchen, where the pastry cook, misunderstanding the visit in a way she chooses to believe is genuine, offers them almond cakes of a quality that will enter the record nowhere and influence it everywhere. They take the physician's account. They take Philomela's statement, and Philomela — who has sung for these men's superiors and remembers the programme — gives it in the order of the evening, as a certain unsigned advice has suggested, though Antonia would saw her own lyre in half before admitting that the order was not her own idea an hour before the note arrived.

There are three of them besides the clerk, and they have clearly drawn, among themselves, the morning's choreography: the senior man asks, the second man looks, the third man exists to be the person nothing is said in front of, which in Roman administration is a load-bearing function. They view the dining room. The room — washed twice, hung as it was, set for nobody — gives them back the reflection they have come with: a good room, expensive, unremarkable in the way of places that are professionally discreet about being remarkable. The second man runs a finger along a couch frame and looks at it, disappointed by the absence of metaphor. The senior man notes the hanging, the way the inspector did before him — officials in this house always pause at Prima's border, two hundred instances of the same flower insisting on their differences, as if the room kept a register of its own. He does not write it down. There is no column for it. It enters the record anyway, in the margin where Rome files the things that actually persuade people.

Philomela's statement takes eleven minutes. Antonia has counted them against a water-clock the house does not possess, by Diomedes' breathing, which in the presence of paperwork keeps better time. The singer stands — she declines the chair, correctly, as a freeborn woman giving evidence in her employer's house — and gives them the fish, the metre, the crocodile, the laugh. When the third man, whose function is silence, unexpectedly asks whether the deceased had ever visited her rooms after the music, Antonia watches her walk it back like a bucket up a stair.

“Officer, after the music that evening there was no afterwards in this house for Gaius Calpurnius. Before the music there was fish.” She folds her hands over the place where, last night, a dead man's weight registered. “I can go back to the fish again, if the record is hungry.”

The senior man closes that door himself, with the air of a person shutting a draught on a colleague's behalf. Daphne follows, three minutes, pert as a tax receipt: she was resting her voice in the small room, she heard the story through the door, she came out when the laugh changed sound — “a laugh finishing the man instead of the story, officer; it is a singer's distinction and I ask the record's pardon for its accuracy.” Barbatus follows, mountainous, and gives them the street: watch passed, guests departing in order, the widow's house reached by a route he names with a soldier's nostalgia for distances properly walked. He is asked whether anyone left early. “The man left at the hour he was carried, officer,” he says. “Before that, nobody left who hadn't paid to stay. It is a dining house.”

In the kitchen Ammonius has arranged, out of whatever instinct makes Alexandrians lay ambushes with hospitality, a complete reconstructive exhibit of the fish course: the sauce (rebuilt), the fish (today's cousin), the little salted lake fish in a dish like a formation of silver boats. He invites the prefect's men to inspect it as men inspect a treaty. The second man, whose function is looking, looks. The clerk, whose function is writing, writes kitchen in order with the hopeless fluency of a man who has written it before in this house in a previous inquiry and will keep the phrase in his hand like a lover's lock of hair.

“You serve dormice,” the senior man says to Antonia. It is in his commission somewhere, probably under headings.

“I serve what rich men will pay to feel wicked about at a price that includes the absolution. Dormice are a tax on guilt, officer. The meat is incidental.”

“The deceased ate—”

“One. At the fourth course, with honey, while telling Philomela that elegiacs were a disease of his class. Nikias' account has the count, and the count of his wine, which I caused to be watered at his end of the table by house policy, because his physician wrote to mine last year and physicians, unlike committees, share their minutes.” This is new information and she gives it the way she gives everything dangerous: as paperwork, over a counter, with the seal already on it. “Diomedes has the letter. It is uninteresting as prayer. That is how the house files its foresight.”

The letter comes. The senior man reads it standing in the kitchen doorway with cakes cooling beside him like small pieces of contrary evidence against the whole theory of poisoners running pastry sections. His face does the thing her rooms specialise in: it tells the truth under the arrangement, for exactly one second, before he files it under conduct unbecoming. What it says, for that second, is that he has been sent by a competent prefect to audit a competently run house for the benefit of a senatorial uncle's grief and a committee's convenience, and that the paperwork — physician retained, wine watered by instruction, accounts deposited before the cock was thinking about it — is going to make the correct thing also the easy thing, a conjunction Roman officialdom experiences so rarely that it annotates it in the margins.

“The ring,” he says, because the second man, looking as assigned, has been looking at the box in Diomedes' office where it sits among the forgotten. “Serapion's. For the singer. It is in the Alexandrian's statement.”

“It is in the box,” Antonia says, “where it will remain until your inquiry has concluded, after which she may file it with her Greek like any other audience. If it were the price of a statement, officer, it would be on her hand and in the baths by now. I run a house, not a mint.”

He looks at her then — not the almost-smile; something drier, the respect officials pay to systems that will outlast their masters' instructions. “Madam,” he says, “I shall write that the house cooperated.”

“Write that the house was boring,” Antonia says. “Cooperation is a word with gleams on it. Walk it back to the fish.”

“You keep a physician on retainer,” the senior man says.

“I keep a house full of rich men eating dormice in a heat they complain of and pay extra to sit in. A physician on retainer is not foresight. It is tableware.”

“And the dead man owed you money.”

“Diomedes.” The tablet comes, the upright hand, the small sum, a dinner in December and a loan against a racehorse, stamped, witnessed, uninteresting as prayer. “He owed me less than his uncle spends on mourning. If I poisoned debtors of this size, officer, Rome would need a second Tiber.”

The man almost smiles, files the smile under conduct unbecoming, and closes the tablet. At the door, with the correctness that has carried them both through the day like a shared umbrella, he says, “The prefect will find a death by misadventure, madam, if misadventure is what the account supports. The prefect is not influenced by committees.”

“Tell the prefect the house appreciates inhabiting the same city as his principles.”

When they have gone, Eirene says, “The note helped.”

“The physician helped. The cakes helped. Notes are just handwriting that has been for a walk.” Antonia puts the note in the box with the tax receipts, beside its predecessor, between the quarters: a small, growing archive of a language neither of them writes in anymore and both of them still read fluently. “Barbatus said the widow asked for me.”

“She asked whether he suffered and whether he was — alone with anyone, at the end. Barbatus said he died laughing at a story about a tax farmer, in a room full of witnesses, with a singer holding his shoulders. She said, 'He would have liked the witnesses.' Then she cried, he said, like a person opening shutters.”

“Send her the December bill,” Antonia says. “Marked settled. And flowers that cost less than the bill, so it doesn't look like arithmetic.”

The verdict, when it comes three days later, comes in the form of things not happening. No second visit. No seal on the dining room. A line in the prefect's morning list, read out among market frauds and a collapsed stair in the Subura: death by misadventure, the heart; no further interest. Diomedes enters it in the first book under officials, concluding, and the entry is so dull that Antonia, reading it over his shoulder, experiences the professional pleasure she takes in good drainage: the dangerous thing has been conducted underground, by paperwork, to a place where it can rot usefully as precedent.

By noon the baths have amended the record. The poison dies of a heart complaint; the tax farmer is unmarried from the singer; the carrying-out singing survives, as it will survive for thirty years, because it is the only version with music in it. Philomela hears it from a client that same evening — for the house reopens on the fourth day, in the order of the evening, with the hanging up and the little salted fish unannounced and Gaius Calpurnius' couch given, by Antonia's instruction, to the elderly advocate, a man whose heart has been reported to his wife, by the same Nikias, as administratively immortal.

“I am told I carried him out singing,” Philomela says.

“You held his shoulders. The city has scored it for full chorus.” Antonia hands her, across Diomedes' counter, the box with Serapion's ring in it. “The inquiry has concluded. It is now merely a present from a man who watched you work. File it with the Greek.”

Philomela looks at the ring in its bed of forgotten things — beside it, somebody's stylus has been claimed and gone, leaving a stylus-shaped improvement in the cedar dust — and does not put it on. “In Corinth,” she says, “my mother would have called this a down payment on being believed.”

“In Rome it is a receipt for it. The direction of travel matters.” Antonia closes the box on the rest of the city's lowered guard. “Sing the fast version tonight, for the first set. The room will want its characters back.”

The widow comes on the fifth day, in the dead middle of the afternoon, veiled in the grey that costs more than colour, with the sister who started lists. Eirene meets them — Barbatus, who announced them by no name at all, having learned his trade in this house's school of weather — and brings them not to the great room but to the small dining room, sized to nobody's self-regard, where Antonia keeps the April-weather conversations. There is water. There are, inevitably, the almond cakes.

“I wanted to see the room,” the widow says, “and then I got to the street and I didn't.” She is younger than Antonia expected from Barbatus' report — thirty, perhaps; Roma has filed her under mourning so completely that the youth comes as a kind of clerical error. “My sister says a visit is an admission.”

“Of appetite,” Antonia says. “Take a cake. Women's visits are admitted here for any reason they choose to file.”

The sister, at the widow's shoulder, performs the family office of looking for traps in the pastry. The widow takes a cake and eats it — actually eats it, grief being a country where the customs forms do not always arrive — and says, “He wrote elegiacs. Did he tell you? It seems important that the room know. The versions—” Her mouth does the thing Antonia has watched all week in mirrors and at tables: it composes itself at cost. “The versions have him cuckolded and poisoned and carried out singing. None of them have him breathable.”

“Philomela has his measure,” Antonia says. “And the house has his evening in the order it happened, sealed, with two physicians on it like a treaty. Neither will be published. That is a form of mourning Rome is competent at: the unfiled kind.” She does not offer to show the account.

Showing accounts is for tax offices and bankers; what she offers, by Diomedes' prior placement on the low table between them, is the December bill marked settled, and the flowers Eirene already sent, now three days past flowers and into evidence of having been meant.

The widow looks at the bill a long time. “He owed for a racehorse too,” she says at last, with a sound her sister will later report, inaccurately, as composure giving way. “The horse is still alive. It owes us, on form. I have kept the horse, madam. I have given away his library to the uncle, his seal to the household gods, and his elegiacs —” the mouth again, the cost again “— I have kept those too. Somebody in this city is going to have to be the archive of the true ones. The versions.”

“Then keep them where the light is,” Antonia says, “and let the baths keep theirs. Baths evaporate.” It is more advice than she gives widows as a class; but it has been a week of unsigned advice arriving by hand and proving good, and a house, like a singer, develops in the direction of its exercises. The widow rises; the sister's list closes over the visit like water over a stone; at the door the widow turns, in her costly grey, with the December bill folded into her sleeve like a letter.

“He liked your fish,” she says. “He came home in December and said the fish had stopped being ambition. I have thought about that all week, whether it is a fit thing to put on a tomb.”

“Put he died laughing,” Antonia says. “Diomedes already has. In the second book, in the hand for facts that must survive fashion. The first book is the one the committee reads.”

When they have gone, Eirene clears the cakes in silence, and the house does a thing it has not done in four days: it simply becomes a house again, being prepared for an evening, with nobody rehearsing fire procedures against the prefect, the committee, or the sound of a laugh changing key. Ammonius is rebuilding a sauce. Daphne is practising scales at a volume calculated to annoy nobody who matters. In the courtyard the garden roses, overwatered as nations, open their January account with the sun. The inquiry is over. What it has cost, and whom, is itemised nowhere the first book keeps.

Eirene goes to arrange the flowers that are not arithmetic. Antonia sits a moment in the emptied dining room under the hanging with the red border, listening to her house's heart resume its ordinary rhythm, and allows herself — the room is empty, the accounts are straight, a man is dead who died laughing and there are worse inscriptions — one unfiled thought, arrived in a familiar hand: In the order of the evening, not the order of the questions. It is how you tell any story if the telling is to save you. It is how she has never yet told hers.

Chapter Ten

Transtiberim

. . .

Diomedes goes to Transtiberim to buy thread. He buys, in the course of a slow and scented morning among the fullers' vats — urine and earth and the clean, assertive smell of other people's garments being forgiven — a great deal of thread. He buys red, which the house does not need, and undyed linen thread, which it does, and he buys, with the unhurried negligence of a man spending someone else's money on someone else's errand, the following: that Vibius the fuller was freed twenty-two years ago by a master in the tanning trade; that his wife, dead two winters, was a Baiae woman, a laundress, who came to Rome in the household of a dealer; that the couple, childless through the first years of their freedom, took in a child in the winter of the year the old emperor died — a girl, days old, brought by a midwife whose nails, an old woman at the vat remembers unprompted and then wishes she hadn't, were hennaed; that money came with the child, not much, regularly, for some years, then stopped, as money does when the hand that sends it dies or decides the account is closed; that the girl was raised as born to them — “and whose business is it, Greek?” says the old woman, suddenly, with the fuller's wife's whole defensive city in her voice — “she was fed, she was taught, she's betrothed to a baker with a mother like a customs office, she is theirs in every way the gods inspect—” and Diomedes, who has what he came for and more than he wants, buys thread from the old woman at her price, which is also a way of saying: this conversation is a transaction; I was never an inquiry.

He does not go straight back across the river. A man who has bought information at a vat the way he would buy thread — casually, at the seller's price, without informing their fathers — owes his employer, and himself, a second column. Diomedes has kept other people's books too long to carry a single entry up the Caelian and call it an audit. So he continues, thread parcels accumulating on his arm like a tradesman's alibi, down the fullers' street to where the tanners have theirs, the smell changing its argument as he crosses the invisible border between two of Rome's necessary stenches.

The tanner who freed Vibius is long dead, but the trade keeps widows the way the Senate keeps masks: for the record, and so that somebody in the family can still answer questions in a voice with authority in it. The widow is eighty, deaf in the ear she presents to creditors, sharp in the other. She sells Diomedes a strap he does not need and tells him, for the strap's sake, that Vibius was freed with money in the transaction that the family — her family, she says, arranging her hands like tools on a bench — did not supply entire.

“Someone put up the rest?” Diomedes asks, examining the strap as if straps were the errand.

“Someone's steward put up the rest. Twenty-two years ago come the vintage. Quarterly after, whilst the child was little. It was called a debt my man owed in Campania, only my man, God keep him, never owed a debt in Campania in his life except a mule, and we ate the mule's replacement in the hard year.” She looks at him with the one sharp ear's worth of hearing. “You are from a house that buys thread.”

“I am from a house that pays on the day.”

“Then pay for the strap, Greek, and I'll throw in what my man said at the end, which was that the money was clean even if the errand wasn't, and that Vibius would have taken the girl for nothing by the second winter. Fullers,” she says, with a tanner's whole professional contempt and, underneath it, the respect of one river trade for another, “keep what they're given to keep. It's the earth in their hands. Everything sticks.”

At the guild office — a room over a wine shop where the fullers keep their common chest, their funeral lists and a clerk with a cough like a small dog announcing strangers — Diomedes buys no thread at all, the guild not selling any, and is therefore obliged to be himself in his second-best capacity: a respectable freedman making enquiries for a mistress who commissions work across the river and wishes to place further work with a household of good standing. Standing is a word the guild understands in all its denominations. The clerk produces, from a chest that smells of cedar and other men's funerals, the household's entry: manumission registered, dues paid without interruption, a wife's death two winters ago with the guild's contribution to the pyre recorded, a daughter of the house listed — the clerk's stylus moves past the line at the speed of men who have written such lines before — in the year after the old emperor's death, in the column where the guild, which is wiser in these matters than the Senate, records not births but arrivals in the household.

Diomedes looks at the line for exactly as long as a man verifying standing should look, and no longer. He has, in the course of eleven years, read most of the important sentences of his working life upside down, in passage, or by the light of other people's intentions. This one he reads right way up, and it is worse.

“The dues are never late,” the clerk says, apologising for the house in the way of guilds, which is to say recommending it to history. “Vibius pays in the bad winters first and eats after. The daughter sews for half the bridal trade this side. If your mistress wants standing, Greek, there it stands.”

“My mistress,” Diomedes says, “wants thread,” and buys, from the wine shop below because the morning requires ballast for the story he is not telling, a flask he will present to Barbatus as the expedition's entire official yield.

By then it is past noon and the river light is coming up off the water in the hard, interrogative way it does in winter, making everyone's errands look like testimony. He makes one more call, and it is the one he has been scheduling for last since the vats, the way men schedule the dentist they call a physician in Rome and the word is the same in Greek. The dealer's household that brought the Baiae laundress to Rome has dwindled, in twenty years, to a freedwoman keeping a cookshop by the island bridge, where she sells a lentil dish with an imperial reputation among bargees. Diomedes eats it standing. It is very good. He says so. In the freemasonry of freedpeople who keep books in one form or another, a compliment about lentils, paid on the day, will open almost as much as money.

“Claudia,” she says, when he asks, in the third person of a man ordering thread, after old servants of the house. “The Baiae woman. She married across to a fuller, tanner's man Vibius. Hands like yours — counting hands. She could carry a house down ninety stairs and tell you the tally at the bottom without spilling.” The cook wipes a bowl in the way of women finishing a subject. “She came up from Baiae the winter I was still in the house. Brought nothing with her that I ever saw, except the counting. Then a year or so on there's a baby in the fuller’s house and money coming through hands, and Claudia — I went to the naming, Greek, I ate there — Claudia looks at that child the way our mistress used to look at a table she'd set herself. Like a thing she'd arranged to keep. There's women have children and women keep them, and sometimes the gods file them under different names. You want more lentils?”

He wants, suddenly, to be on the bridge with the river under him doing its old work of carrying things away in pieces too small to invoice. He pays for lentils he has not ordered a second bowl of, which the cook accepts as the conversation's true currency. Three columns now agree, in the only book this item will ever be entered in, which is his memory, in the hand he keeps for facts that must survive fashion.

He walks home across the island bridge slowly, a freedman in early middle age carrying thread and an undetonated century. He has served Antonia eleven years. He knows her books' three handwritings, her policy on glass jewellery, the exact depth of the silence she keeps about Baiae; he has never, in eleven years, seen her face do what he is now obliged to walk toward and cause. He composes, as all good secretaries compose, the order of the evening. He decides against the order of the questions. She taught him that herself, years ago, over a disputed invoice: Tell me what happened, Diomedes. I will supply the cross-examination internally, at my usual rates.

She listens with a stylus in her hand. She does not write. At the hennaed nails the stylus stops its small, unconscious turning, and at the money stopping it resumes, and these are the only two entries her body makes in the record.

“The year,” she says.

“The winter the old emperor died.”

“Nineteen years.” She counts it aloud at last, in the counting voice, the coins-in-the-dark voice. “Nineteen. The midwife said — not strong. A girl, not strong.” The stylus turns. “Who sent the money?”

“The vats do not know. It came through the dealer's people at first. Then through a steward. A Quirinal household steward, the old woman thinks, before she decided she thought nothing.”

“A steward.” Antonia looks toward the courtyard, where the damp spot has dried in the week's sun to the faintest map of Spain. “My mother's master's steward was called Philodorus. He had a way of settling things at a distance and charging the house for the mileage. He died — Eirene heard it from a laundress — nine years ago. The same winter as old Gnaeus Cornelius.” She sets the stylus down in exact alignment with the edge of the tablet, an act of government over the only province presently obeying her. “So the money stopped when the men who were paying to forget had both finished dying.”

“Philodorus,” Antonia says again. The name does what names do in her memory: it opens a room with furniture in it. A steward's office off a Quirinal corridor, oak galls and other people's weather, and a man of forty with a pen-knife he used the way other men use doctrine, trimming, trimming. He settled the rental rolls. He settled the young master's mishaps. In the winter everything in that house changed its address, he settled — but the room will keep. She has housekeeping to do in this one.

“Show me the years,” she says.

Diomedes takes a fresh tablet — not any of the three books' wax; a practice tablet, the kind the kitchen boy learns on, which will be smoothed by supper. It is the most serious gesture available in the room and both of them know it. He writes in his own hand for once, the hand nobody sees, quick and ugly and hers by long hire. A winter. A muster morning she has not named and he does not either; he writes around it the way stewards write around a stair. A dealer's contract: with increase. She watches those two words arrive on a child's practice tablet in her own office, in a clerk's fast hand, nineteen years after she read them upside down standing very still with her hands folded, and the stylus in her own hand — she has taken it up again without deciding to — resumes its turning at a speed she would fine a guest for.

Baiae. Stairs. The laundress Claudia in the same household, counting linen like a liturgy. A midwife — his stylus hesitates, a toll-gate, and writes nails, because even in his own hand there are things a man writes the short way. Money in a sleeve. A report.

"The report," Antonia says. "Write it as it was said."

"Madam."

"Write it, Diomedes. We are auditing. Upside down and at their prices is how I have always read it."

He writes: a girl, not strong.

The room goes on being a room — courtyard light, the ghost-map drying, somewhere Ammonius instructing a sauce in the difference between Alexandria and Rome — and Antonia looks at the four words that bought her ability to stand up and climb stairs again within the fortnight, and finds that at thirty-eight, with a house around her and three sets of books, the words have lost their power to be the end of the account. They are an entry. Entries can be audited. It is a poorer comfort than the one they replaced, and better, the way medicine is better than honey.

"On," she says.

The river crossing. The tanner's manumission completed with other people's money, the guild chest, the cookshop by the bridge: arrivals in the household. Quarterly sums through a steward until the winter both men died. Then nothing — the nothing that is, in Diomedes' rendering, its own eloquent column, because the household continued, the dues were paid in bad winters first and the girl was taught, counted, kept. He draws a line under nothing, as if it were a sum.

“That line,” Antonia says, “is the first honest item anyone has entered in this account in nineteen years. A fuller and a laundress, paying silence off by instalments long after the men who bought it stopped funding it.” Her voice is doing its duties. Her hands have stopped asking permission so successfully that they have stopped altogether, folded now, the way they were folded once for a contract reading, in front of a dealer. She notices this. She un-folds them, deliberately, an act of government over the province she actually owns. “What is she called in the guild book?”

“Prima,” Diomedes says. “Vibia Prima. In the column for arrivals.”

“First,” Antonia says. The stylus turns. “They called the kept one first. Write it down — no.” The correction crosses the room like the laugh in the dining room changed key. “Don't write that down anywhere, Diomedes. That word is hers and theirs. We are not registering her in this office. We are learning, at my usual rates, what the city did with my instructions and my money and my—” She stops, at the exact edge of the noun, the way she stops at the edge of a table she has set herself. “With the goods,” she finishes, in the dealer's own Latin, savagely. “His word. Let it stand in the minutes next to his name, wherever dead men keep them.”

He smooths the practice tablet as he writes, paragraph by paragraph, so that the facts go out of the world in the order they came into the room: in the order of the evening, though neither of them says the phrase, because phrases, like letters, arrive at addresses their authors never wrote, and this one is not due on the Caelian in a slave's hand yet. What remains when the wax is smooth is a man and a woman in an office with nothing on paper at all and everything in the second column.

“One more column, madam,” Diomedes says quietly. “The tanner's widow said a thing for the price of a strap. That Vibius would have taken the child for nothing by the second winter. I entered it nowhere, but I bring it as it was given: it has a face."

Antonia looks toward the courtyard, where Eirene is presently crossing with lamps, and where, on Tuesdays, a needlewoman counts with her mouth open and refuses the kitchen. "Yes," she says at last. "That one has a face. That is how I know it is not paper."

Diomedes says nothing. It is the most expensive service he renders her, and he renders it now at the full rate.

"I will not have her told by a vat," Antonia says at last. "Not by a Greek buying thread, not by a committee, not by the baths. If there is a telling, it will be in this order: I will be certain; she will be told by someone she already trusts with a needle; and no one — Diomedes, write this in whichever book governs the end of the world — no one will use her, meanwhile, as an instrument against any living Cornelius. She is not paper. I have paper for that."

"Thread," Diomedes says, and bows, and goes to put eleven years of discretion around a morning's purchases like linen around glass.

Across the river, at the same hour, in an office smelling of cedar and old evenings, a practice tablet is being smoothed for the third time by a man putting his day's discretion around it like linen around glass. The smoothing takes longer than the writing took. That is also professional. Diomedes has smoothed money-laundering, a senator's ring, two elopements that the books record as staff, transferred, and once — in the two-table years, in a lodging over a fuller's whose vats now do the house's linen at a family rate neither party will itemise — a letter Antonia dictated standing up and then stood watching him unwax, word by word, with the expression of a woman supervising the carrying of her own furniture.

He brings the clean tablet back to the desk where she is still, absurdly, working. "The thread account is closed, madam," he says. It is their word, after today, for an entire department of government. "The house is owed a hanging's delivery on Thursday. Barbatus will walk it over himself. He has views about the bridge — that it is watched, and that watching is to be answered with lamp oil and courtesy."

“Then Thursday,” Antonia says, and does not take up a stylus, and the lamps go down by sections across the courtyard, the theatre lit from the back going home. “Diomedes. In whichever book governs — yes. That one. Enter this: nothing was used today. Nobody was spent. Make it look boring enough to survive.”

He bows, and writes nothing down, which in his system, as the whole city will one day have cause to learn, is the most serious form of record.

■

Prima knows nothing of any of this, which is the last night of not-knowing she will ever sleep in whole, though she has no way to mark it. Her day is fully occupied by the ordinary treacheries: the baker's mother, who has discovered that Prima reads and is consulting her own mother-in-law scars about whether reading in a wife is a dowry or a defect; her father Vibius, whose cough has taken up residence for the winter and is redecorating; the hanging's second border, complete now, paid on the day — with a sum for thread, itemised, which made her father look at her over his soup with the expression of a man who has always known his daughter was worth more than the world agreed and is experiencing vindication as a kind of grief.

The baker's mother has chosen this morning, from a calendar of inspections that the neighbourhood keeps the way the Senate keeps its committees, to find out whether reading in a wife is a dowry or a defect. She has devised a test. It arrives in the form of Titus's yeast account, delivered by Titus himself, broad-handed and apologetic, with flour on one forearm like a senator's stripe and a story about the yeast man's widow that is clearly intended to be the reason the account is in Prima's hands at all.

“Mother says will you cast it, since you're here with nothing but the hanging done.”

“I am here,” Prima says, “with the hanging done. It took a month. Rome was built slower, Titus, but with more help.”

She casts it at the fullers' table, with her father supervising the house's noises from the doorway and coughing disapproval of all secondhand arithmetic. The yeast man's bill is wrong by eleven sesterces in the yeast man's favour. It is in the second column. It is always in the second column. She shows Titus where his own hand, in a hurry at the oven door, has let a figure be carried like a tray — seen, applauded, set down in the wrong room.

“Eleven,” Titus says, with the injured respect of a man watching his future being competently itemised. “That's a day's buns.”

“That's a day's buns a month, which is a roof in ten years.” Prima sands the tablet with the edge of her thumb, a trick she has lately acquired from watching better clerks than Titus, in houses he does not ask about. “Tell your mother reading is a dowry. In my case it comes with tools.”

Titus laughs, and the laugh does the thing it does in small rooms over vats: it recruits the father, the doorway and a neighbour carrying a garment past the window into brief, unreasonable citizenship. This is what her betrothal looks like from inside, on a good winter morning: not the contract read once, quickly, with her dowry of tools stumbled over; not Mother Livia's hems; but a boy with flour up his arm holding a ladder steady while she climbs into a column and comes down with eleven sesterces and the neighbourhood's opinion, revised by half a degree, in her favour.

Mother Livia herself arrives at noon with soup, which in that family is a flag of truce with vegetables in it. She has heard about the eleven sesterces at the speed Servilia hears things in another tax bracket. She sets the soup down, inspects the hanging — finished now, folded face inward over the back of the good chair, two hundred flowers sleeping on each other like a cohort at rest — and runs her thumb, the customs officer's thumb, along the border's edge.

“The mistress on the Caelian paid on the day?”

“On the day, Mother Livia. Thread itemised.”

“Itemised,” the older woman repeats, tasting the foreign coin. “Your mother would have liked a woman who itemises. She kept that book of hers — the leaves — stairs and owings. A body would think she meant to present it in the next world as evidence.” She says it without looking at Vibius, and Vibius, in the doorway, looks with great attention at the soup, and Prima, between them, understands that a conversation she is not in has just taken place over her finished work, in the dialect adults use where children used to stand. She files it where she files all such exchanges: under her needles, where the leaves themselves live, weighing nothing.

The guild women come in the afternoon, in the plural that in Transtiberim constitutes an institution. They have come about Vibius's cough — a syrup, a visitation rota, the serious business of whether the guild physician is to be asked for a second time at the guild's expense or whether the fuller will be allowed, as one of them puts it, to die at his own rates like a contractor — and they stay, as the plural always stays, for the unfolding of the hanging. Prima shakes it out over the table. The red flowers march. A silence performs the neighbourhood's true review.

“Put your name in it,” says the oldest of them, the woman from the vats, who has lately been looking at Prima the way Mother Livia looks at a hem. “In the border. Where it won't show unless you're looking for who held the work.”

“Tradeswomen don't sign table linen,” Prima says.

“Tradeswomen sign whatever will be read after they're filed.” The old woman's hands stay in her sleeves. She has lately sold a great deal of thread to a Greek from the right bank, at her price, and the transaction has completed itself in her like a sum coming right at the second count. “Your mother signed stairs, in Baiae, with her feet. Ninety of them, twice a day, with her name in no book the house kept.” She looks at the flowers as if they were a procession she has decided to let pass. “Sign yours, girl. It is a new fashion. I have it on the best authority across the river.”

Prima does not sign. Not yet. She folds the hanging face inward, so that whatever the world does to it in transit happens to the back of the flowers, and the guild women go out into the winter street with the syrup administered, the rota arranged, and the neighbourhood's whole unwritten archive adjusted by one entry, somewhere between the quarters.

“Eat at the house?” he asks.

“Never. As instructed.” She pushes his cup toward him; the cough medicine is mostly honey and authority. “The mistress asked after my mother's town. Baiae. I said she talked about stairs. The mistress went quiet the way rich women go quiet at a price.”

Vibius looks into his cup for a long time. He is a man who has carried other people's garments through urine and fuller's earth and out the other side clean, and he believes, in his bones, that most things can be got washable if you do not rush the soak. “Your mother,” he says, “talked about stairs because in Baiae she worked for a house with ninety of them and a mistress who timed her. She said a person should count stairs so the stairs don't count them.” He coughs. “She was the countingest woman I ever knew, your mother. Counting and keeping. Keeping especially.”

“Keeping what?”

“Us,” Vibius says, and drinks, and is discovered by his daughter, watching him, to be looking at her with the full apparatus of his love arranged on his face like tools on a bench, which frightens her more than any hem-inspection, because her father is a man who keeps his feelings the way he keeps his accounts: accurately, and at the back.

After supper — soup at the front of it, in the position of honour, so that Mother Livia's truce is properly entered in the house's own books — Prima does the thing she has been not doing since the vats woman left. She takes out the leaves.

They live under her needles in the work-box, folded into a square of undyed linen, and they smell, after two years, of the box's cedar and faintly of the vats, which is to say of every true thing in her life. They are not a book. They will never survive an editor, a fire, or a winter in a damp room, and her mother, who understood material better than any woman Prima will ever meet on either bank, clearly intended exactly that frailty: these are accounts meant to be presented, not preserved; evidence for a hearing in a jurisdiction that keeps no copies.

The hand is the counting hand, learned late and written large. House at Baiae, the widow's, ninety stairs. Under it, columns that are not columns yet: names, with the work beside them, the way the guild book writes arrivals. Aemilia, linen. Paid festival only. Io, lamps. Gone north with the sale. Girl from Puteoli, name not asked, carried water the hard winter, owed the summer. Page by leaf-leaf they go, through houses whose owners Rome has filed under furniture, until the hand changes: smaller, later, the letters coming the way steps come when the basket is full. A new column, headed with a word Prima has read a hundred times without its ever having explained itself, the way household gods don't: Kept.

Under Kept, names again. Hers is not among them. She has noticed this before, in the noticing way of girls who read other people's news held steady: by expecting the omission so completely it has never had a shape. Tonight, with the old woman's voice still in the room — sign yours, girl; I have it on the best authority across the river — the omission stands up off the leaf like a figure mis-carried into the second column. Her mother kept a ledger of the unpaid and the kept, of stairs climbed with nobody's name in the house's books, and of the women the houses owed when they died. In all those leaves there is no entry for a daughter arrived. There is a blank space, wider than the others, after the last Kept name, with a stitch-mark beside it — Prima puts her thumb on it, the customs officer's granddaughter by trades rather than blood — a little cross, carefully, like a count being taken of something that would be finished later.

“Father,” she says. The room's noises arrange themselves the way troops arrange in other houses' atria. Vibius is in the doorway of the sleeping room with his honey, supervising. “In Mother's leaves. Under

Kept. There's a space."

He looks at her for a long time, and she understands that she has walked a question back to the wrong end of an evening that has not happened yet, and that her father — who keeps his feelings the way he keeps accounts, accurately and at the back — is deciding, at a pace the cough sets, what can be carried and what must be set down in this doorway, tonight, between the soup and the honey.

"Your mother," he says at last, "left spaces where the count wasn't finished. She said a completed book is a dead one." He coughs, and drinks, and goes through to his bed with the competence of a man banking a fire he will not see lit. "Sign nothing till the count comes right, Prima. She'd have said that. It'll be among the sayings."

She folds the leaves face inward, the way she folds her best work, so that whatever the world does to them in the night happens to the back of the flowers. Then she takes the day's last job off the good chair — her own hem, as it happens, parting at the ankle like a sentence deciding to be continued elsewhere — and sews it in the light going blue at the shutter, counting stitches with her mouth open, unaware, as her mother once put it, that the stairs or the centuries are counting her back.

That night she dreams — she will remember this later, and disbelieve the remembering, and be right both times — of a courtyard with roses and a woman counting coins in the dark, getting it wrong, beginning again. She wakes before the count comes right. The winter light is at the shutter. Her father's cough is counting itself in the next room. She gets up to heat the honey, an ordinary daughter in Transtiberim, last morning of the world as filed, and puts a pot on a small fire with the competence of women in her family going back, though she could not name them, through laundries and dressing rooms, through ninety stairs in Baiae and a mirror held steady at seventeen, all the way down the long female ledger of Romans who kept other people's houses standing and called it, because the language offered nothing better, nothing at all.

Chapter Eleven

The Sealed Tablet

. . .

He opens it on a night of rain because the rain keeps the clients away and leaves the atrium to the masks, and because a man does everything eventually for a reason he would strike from the record. He tells the household he is reviewing the estate papers. He is, in the largest sense his family permits the word: the estate is the past; the papers are its rent book.

The rain has been deciding since the third hour. It is the Roman winter kind that does not fall so much as take up residence in the air, insinuating itself into wool, into the joints of old houses and older shoulders, into the acoustics of an atrium so that every household sound arrives with a small, wet echo, as if the building were being read back to itself in a poorer copy. Clients have sent boys with apologies shaped like fish. A cousin has sent fish shaped like an apology. Servilia has deployed both where they will do the house credit: the fish to the kitchen, the apologies to the steward's book, in which called, weather is a category of loyalty with its own rate of interest.

Lentulus has spent the day, accordingly, in the company of things he can postpone. There is the aqueduct business, early yet, a leaking arcade on the Praeneste road that two municipalities are using to conduct a feud by other means; he has written three letters about water that say, in descending order of candour, repair it, pay for it jointly, and stop writing to me as if gravity were a party. There is the committee draft, general, eventual and dull, as agreed in this house by a power who did not need to be named in the minutes. There is a speech for the harbour dues that his future relations by marriage require and that he keeps revising toward a decency its beneficiaries would find alarmingly principled if they read drafts, which, in the manner of rich men, they will not.

At intervals — the household could set a water-clock by them; Onesimus, forgetting professionally, does — he passes the atrium. The masks are being cleaned today, the year's smoke sponged off by two slaves under Servilia's steward's eye, in a ceremony the house performs the way other families visit tombs: regularly, and with gossip. Grandfather Gnaeus comes down off his cupboard into safer hands than any that ever carried him in life. His wax face, undarkened for an hour by the sponge's diplomacy, looks younger than his son's memory allows, which Lentulus finds an impertinence in a material. Under the mask, the cupboard's interior shows for a moment — scroll-cases, a campaign chest's worth of family paper, the particular case — before the steward, who knows which things in this house are seen by appointment, moves his body a fraction into the light.

"Shall I have the case's leather fed, dominus? The damp—"

"Leave it," Lentulus says. "Leather in this family is expected to endure climate."

He has left it, in various formulations, for nine years. A man can leave a thing in a sentence for nine years the way a house can leave a room locked: by building his daily routes around it until the skirting of it feels like the architecture itself. The tablet came to him at his father's will-reading in a winter of committees — older wars: a governorship refused, a consulship (suffect, footnoted) accepted, Marcus loud as a gate at eleven, Cornelia not yet arrived, the nine-day girl newly unspoken-of in the grammar of previous consulships. The notary had read the item without emphasis, a sealed tablet for my son's eyes, in the tone men use for the minutes of other people's earthquakes, and Lentulus, even then, filing things between quarters in a system he would later learn a woman across the city had invented independently and better, had put the case under his grandfather and told himself it concerned the estates.

It might have done. His father, on his deathbed, had talked estates for a full day — drainage, a bailiff's peculation handled by Philodorus' successor with Philodorus' own knife, trimming, trimming — and had then, in the small hours, asked for his seal and a fresh tablet with a clarity the household reported, awed, as the old man sitting up in himself again. Philodorus was nine months dead by then. The old Gnaeus wrote alone. What a man writes alone, after a day of drainage, with death already in the room gathering the letters at the ends of lines, is unlikely to be drainage. Lentulus has known this the way he knows most structural facts about his family: exactly, at the back, with the accounts.

Marcus comes home at dusk, wet through from the baths that are his postings abroad, and brings the rain indoors on his shoulders and in his news: the inquiry is filed, the prefect's dullness is being quoted as integrity, an Alexandrian in the warm room has a version of last week's death in which the physician arrives by chariot. Cornelia, at the far side of the garden room, is practising at half volume because rain on the roof turns the house into an instrument she is not officially playing. Lentulus watches his children being young in a wet house at the exact ages — twenty, sixteen — at which their parents, in two different cities of the same empire, were being arranged and sold respectively, and the thought does not so much arrive as take the seat it apparently had reserved: everything in this family requires a death to become sayable. A man has died at her table, laughing at a tax farmer, with a singer holding his shoulders.

Servilia, from the doorway, sees it arrive. She sees everything arrive; it is her quartermaster's genius and her marriage's weather. What she says is, “The household will eat early. The rain.” What she does, over the next hour, is clear the atrium the way stages are cleared in the theatres when the machine-god is expected: no clients, no lessons, the masks back in their cupboards cleaned and looking younger than their descendants, a lamp ration calculated for a long sitting, and the steward informed, in the sentence Lentulus will later know word for word, that the master is reviewing the estate papers and is not to be improved upon by attendance.

She does not say open it. Servilia has never spent a direct order where an arrangement would do the work at half the price and twice the dignity. She arranges. And Lentulus, who has been commanded by emperors in both languages the libraries keep, goes into the atrium at nightfall with the rain sending its small messengers down through the compluvium, in the old rhythm, the one that measured his childhood lessons, and puts his hand, at last, to the cupboard that sticks in winter.

The cupboard under his grandfather's mask sticks, as it always sticks in winter. The tablet is where he left it nine years ago, in the scroll-case whose leather has gone the colour of everything in this house that is not wax or wool. His father's seal: the cornel-wood sprig, the old joke of the Cornelii, a family that turned a tree into three centuries of magistracies. He breaks it with his thumb the way you break the skin on cooling milk, hating the delicacy, wanting the violence minuted somewhere.

His father's hand had been a public instrument even in private: large, exact, unhurried by death, which was already in the room when he wrote this — Lentulus can see it at the ends of lines, where the letters gather themselves like men deciding not to run.

Gnaeus to Gnaeus. You will open this late. We are a family that opens things late and calls it dignity. Attend.

The girl from Baiae did not die there. The child — a daughter — lived. I paid the midwife to say otherwise and the steward to place her where the Cornelii would never have to spell her name. A freed couple across the river, fullers, decent people in the way that matters, which is to say they were paid and then, to their credit, continued after the paying stopped being their reason. I had the payments put through Philodorus so that you could truthfully say you knew nothing. You asked me once if there was a child. I said there was nothing living with a claim on this house. It was the truest sentence available that preserved the house, and I offer you now the observation, too late to be useful to me, that a lifetime of such sentences will preserve a house the way brine preserves meat.

The rain. The compluvium dripping into its basin in the old rhythm, the one that measured his childhood lessons. He reads on, because stopping has never yet been a policy of his family's that survived contact with a document.

The muster morning comes back the way these things do when a dead man starts initialling paragraphs: not as a scene but as smells in an order. Horse first. Then leather — the campaign chest open at dawn in a house that was putting a son into the army for a season the way it put a name into the Senate for a generation. Then his mother's women somewhere offstage, a corridor of voices in the part of the house he was already too old, at twenty-four, to be found in without an errand. He had an errand. He had, in fact, been manufacturing errands in that corridor for a year, with a rental roll as his passport and a copyist's quick hand for a view, and on that morning the corridor was empty of everything but light behaving as if nothing in Rome had changed addresses in the night.

He remembers asking the question only once and he remembers, with an accuracy his conscience has kept like a Greek keeps a strongbox, the use his father made of the pause before answering. The study smelled of wax. It is the detail that has over the years arranged all the others around itself: hot wax, seal-warm, in a room where land changed families and girls changed owners in the same hand, the hand now in front of him on the tablet, large, exact, gathering at the ends of lines.

“Was there a child?”

He had said it to the side of his father's face, a young man's profile held still by nothing but the house. His father had not looked up from the rolls. A province is being governed somewhere in a man's tone when he does that: the tone says the question has arrived without its paperwork and will be answered as a climate, not a claim. There is nothing living with a claim on this house.

Twenty-one years later, in the rain, with the tablet open under a lamp nobody comes to trim, Lentulus conducts the cross-examination he has been supplying internally, at his usual rates, since he was old enough to have rates. Nothing living. A phrase with room in it for a cradle across a river and a midwife's improved sum. With a claim. A phrase with a steward in it, settling things at a distance and charging the house for the mileage. On this house. As if the child might be living, might have a claim, but the house — the house was a fortress that language could be stationed around like a garrison. His father had not lied. Lying is for men who intend to be found out cheaply. His father had done the thing this family does instead, in excellent Latin, at length: he had chosen the currency, and he had made his son rich in it, and the son had spent it for twenty-one years, in committees, in a marriage, in the small hours, at compound interest.

You tell yourself, he thinks — second person, the pronoun men in his family keep for the minutes of the meetings they hold with themselves — you tell yourself you were twenty-four. Marcus is twenty. You have watched Marcus, this winter, be twenty in baths and dining rooms with a singer's glass necklace and a sister's face at a dinner table, and you have seen the exact moment, in a study with a duplicated grandfather, when the boy began paying for his arithmetic at something nearer the full rate. You were given the same moment, by a father with a seal in his hand, and you took the sentence as an answer because the alternative would have cost you your inheritance of yourself. It is very important, in what remains of the night, not to call that anything else. The tablet in front of you has not called it anything else. That is the courtesy the dead can still perform, when they have stopped needing the living to behave: they stop drafting.

Brine preserves meat. He reads the sentence again. His father, at the end, had a style his son had never heard at table: a kitchen style, unbuttoned, smelling of stores. Perhaps dying men write like freedwomen keep books — in the hand for facts that must survive fashion. Perhaps old Gnaeus, alone with his seal after a day of drainage, had at last met the one client the atrium had never admitted: his own morning, at twenty-four, on the other side of the desk, asking once. And had answered it, a generation too late, addressed to the wrong person. The tablet says so. The tablet — he has not read the rest; the rain is doing his childhood lessons in the basin, and the letters are gathering themselves like men deciding not to run — the tablet has the decency to know its own address is wrong.

The girl was not asked after. That is the sentence under all the sentences, the one the family did not inscribe. Antonia — the name she credits to herself; his father has that right too, damn the old man, damn his accuracy, arriving now like a bailiff with the right papers — Antonia was sold, was told, stood up, climbed. Lentulus is a man who has governed his opinions in public with distinction for twenty years. He has nothing to set against climbed except a career and a committee and an unsigned note about the order of the evening, sent this month by a hand that taught a girl the letter her name begins with. The arithmetic does itself, in stripes, through the shutters of whatever he still calls his conscience: he is not the wronged party in this document. He is its forwarding address.

I do not write this to be forgiven; your forgiveness would be worth what mine was, a generation too late and addressed to the wrong person. The person wronged is not you. The girl was sold on your muster morning with her increase, as the contract said. I wrote those words too. If you have lived as I surmise you have lived — quietly with it, like a stone in the shoe of a marching man — then you may draw what comfort there is in knowing the girl Antonia lives and prospers in Rome under a name she credits to herself, which is more than I can say for the name I left you. The daughter, if she lives, is called by whatever name decency gave her. I never asked it. There are questions a man of my sort does not ask in case the answer turns out to have a face.

Do nothing dramatic. Drama is a tax the rich impose on the poor to pay for their remorse. If the matter ever stands where this family can settle it at a price that is not the girl's life a second time, settle it. A Cornelius pays his debts. We merely prefer, historically, to choose the currency. Choose better.

Lentulus sits with the tablet open until the lamp needs trimming and no slave comes, because Servilia has instructed the household, with the tactical sense that has kept this marriage upright for nineteen years, that the master reviewing estate papers is not to be improved upon by attendance.

A daughter. Called by whatever name decency gave her. He does the arithmetic that Antonia, across the city, in a house with damp in one wall, has done in exactly the same hour of the same winter: nineteen. A person of nineteen, across the river, in a fuller's household, walking about Rome in a body half-made of the Quirinal and half of a mirror-girl's, unknown to herself as either, while her father's committee inspects her mother's drains and her half-brother drinks Falernian downstairs from the accounts room where her existence has just been itemised as thread.

He gets up with the tablet still open, which in a house of sealed things is a kind of rowdiness, and walks the night rooms the way his wife does her round — no noise until he is in a room, then the room owing him an explanation. The slaves have banked the kitchen fire. The garden door has been witnessed and barred, with a marginal note, delivered to nobody in particular by the door slave as Lentulus passes, that the young master is in and the rain is considering a treaty. Cornelia's door is shut, with Tyche's sandals outside it in the position of a small, loyal frontier. From behind it comes nothing but the sound sleep makes in a house where a girl has been well fed, well taught, and — Servilia's system again, in every wall he passes — well defended, mostly against her own family's conversation. He thinks of a settlement with a heading for musicians. He thinks of ballast, a word a shipping heir used at his table, and of girls as ballast in every house that has ever sent its cargo out under old names: his daughter, dowered and scheduled and singing on ration; another daughter, unregistered in any settlement, arriving in a fuller's guild book in the column for households; his niece — no. Let the arithmetic be clean, for once, in the second column. His daughters. The word does what Avidius' figure did when Servilia read it: it stops pretending to be anything else.

He writes nothing that night. This will surprise everyone who knows him by his paperwork, which is everyone who knows him. There is a draft composed — a man composes; it is his family's substitute for every other form of action — in which money is settled through the Greek (of course through the Greek; the Greek is Rome's confessional, with better acoustics) on a fuller’s household across the river, in the form of a legacy from a Baiae mistress neither alive nor safely dead enough to be invoiced. There is a second draft, worse, in which he goes himself. He can see that second draft as its intended recipients would: a senator in a doorway in Transtiberim with the ruined poetry of apology all over his good cloak, a dying man holding a rail, a girl hearing her life read back to her in somebody else's Latin like a contract she is expected to witness. Drama is a tax the rich impose on the poor to pay for their remorse. His father, dead nine years, graded out of a tablet, gets the best line in his son's worst night. It would be funny if the family kept its humour in rooms this small.

There is also — least drafted, most minuted in the body, where the Moesia shoulder files its weather reports — the question of Antonia, which is not, tonight, the question of the girl at all. She knows. He is certain of it with the certainty men of his experience reserve for harbours and wives: she will have had the information before him, cheaper, in the invisible denominations, with the thread itemised separately. She has held his paper at the Greek's for two quarters and held her peace at a higher rate. She returned a dead man's December bill marked settled and sent flowers that cost less, so it should not look like arithmetic. She instructs her people to answer in the order of the evening. Every draft of his that does not go through her first is, he understands with the clarity the masks specialise in after midnight, another sealed tablet: a settlement made about Antonia Cassia, by a Cornelius, in her absence, in a house that has been doing exactly that for three hundred years and calling the house honest.

So the first payment, when he makes it — not tonight; tonight a man is being unsealed at approximately the speed of drainage — will be information, delivered at a banker's back office, in daylight, with chairs. It is the only currency he has never tried with her. At twenty-four he gave her letters, which were luggage. At forty-five his committee gave her an inspection at dawn, which was theft in ministry's clothing. The thing in between, the thing he accepted a statesman's sentence instead of, is apparently the thing that must now be carried across the city in his own hands and set down, without a steward, without mileage. He does not look forward to it with any part of himself that is still his father's son. The rest of him — the part that told the prefect's business to be general, eventual and dull; the part that stood in an atrium at clients' hour seeing his daughter insert an unlicensed turn into music older than the family — that part is quiet in the way of a room that has finished being arranged.

He goes back to the atrium. The lamp is low. The tablet has waited, open, like a client who no longer needs the morning's performance. He reads the end again. Choose better. Two words; his father's whole late style, the brine and the kitchen and the unbuttoned truth of it. Under the mask, the sticking cupboard gives the case back to the dark with its usual sound: a small, drowned click, like a count coming right at the second attempt in another house entirely.

He has, until tonight, been able to tell himself that his quarrel with Antonia Cassia is about Rome. It is a story with columns: public morals, young men's debts, Syria. The tablet does not contradict the columns. It simply shows him the ground they stand on, and the ground is a muster morning and a contract phrase and a question asked once by a young man who accepted a statesman's sentence as an answer because the alternative would have cost him his inheritance of himself.

He closes the tablet. He does not reseal it; a Cornelius does not pretend with wax. He puts it back in the scroll-case, under the mask, in the sticking cupboard, and stands a while in the company of the ancestors, who look down with their smoke-dark patience, every one of them a man who chose his currency.

“Choose better,” he says aloud, to no one, and the atrium, being Roman, keeps the remark in the family.

Onesimus is waiting in the corridor with a dry towel over his arm, as if a man reviewing estate papers in a rainy atrium were a form of bathing that concluded with towelling. He has been stationed there by Servilia since the lamp's second hour: not to attend, which has been forbidden in a sentence the whole household can now recite, but to be in the building's memory of the evening, so that tomorrow, when the baths and the secretaries begin their work, the house will be able to say truthfully that a slave was present in the corridor and heard nothing, saw a lamp, and can describe the weather. Onesimus forgets professionally. It remains his masterpiece.

"The rain is giving its evidence in the order of the evening, dominus," he says, and then, hearing himself deliver a phrase he has picked up in somebody else's plumbing, he files it, visibly, where the house keeps its confiscated eloquence. "Shall I say the master will not shave before the clients?"

"Tell Felix the master will shave at the usual hour." Lentulus takes the towel he does not need and holds it a moment like a client holding a petition he intends to grant. "District business as usual, Onesimus. Aqueducts. A committee, general and dull. A letter to be left unsealed on the mistress's table." He looks back once at the atrium, where his grandfather has resumed the dark with a cleaned face and a cupboard full of the future. "And if a room at a banker's office can be had tomorrow without the household's livery being read into it — cedar door, deaf slave, the usual quiet Greek — you will arrange it as if it were being arranged for somebody else's conscience."

Onesimus bows with the towel still doing its emblematic work. In eleven years he has arranged trysts, bribes, a resignation, two reconciliations that the families concerned describe as military victories, and a committee's entire soft landing into a registry. He will arrange this too, forget it in three languages, and be free in another man's will with the sum named, still forgetting. Somewhere in the house a kitchen fire settles in its ash, keeping itself, the way the poor keep everything: alive, against the morning, at a price no ledger has ever acknowledged because it has always, somehow, been paid.

■

Servilia is awake when he comes to bed. She lies in the posture of sleep that she maintains, like the household order, for the benefit of anyone conducting inspections, and says, without opening her eyes, “The estate papers.”

“Yes.”

“Olives?”

“Not olives.” It is the most intimate sentence they have exchanged in some years. The rain goes on sending its small messengers down through the compluvium of the old house into the basin that has received them for three centuries, and somewhere below, a slave who has not been told to stay away from the whole house, only from one room of it, is damping the kitchen fire for the night, banking it — keeping it, the way the poor keep everything: alive under ash, against the morning, at a price that appears in no one's ledger because it has always been paid.

Servilia says, “Then we will need to be more careful than your father was.”

He looks at her. She has still not opened her eyes. “How long have you—”

“I will tell you the sentence once,” Servilia says, still with her eyes closed, in the voice she uses for reading figures she has already appealed in private. “It was in our first month. Your steward — Philodorus' successor; the knife went with the office — was arranging a dinner to show the new wife the Campanian agents could be received without the knives. Oysters from Baiae were proposed. I said the house in Baiae had been sold, I understood, with the staff dispersed, and would the oysters still be reliable. You went —” She pauses. “There is no gesture. That was the information. You went entirely still, the way Felix says men do under the razor when a household steps on its own hem. My mother, who married me with instructions I have spent nineteen years deciding which of to be disobeyed in, taught me to read a husband's silences the way the house reads a steward's book: in the second column. Yours, over oysters, had a whole province in it.”

Lentulus sits on the edge of the bed in the dark room he has shared, on and off in the manner of great houses, for half his adult life, and looks at the shape of the woman who has been running the war in the adjacent room of every campaign he thought he was conducting alone. “And you said nothing. For nineteen years.”

“I said a great deal. About roofs, and girls' music, and what grain money smells of, and whether a son being twenty is a condition a family can insure. I did not say the word Baiae at that altitude again. A marriage, Lentulus, is a committee that reports when it is told to.” A small movement under the covers that might, in a lesser quartermaster, be a shrug. “You had a physician's statement for a conscience and a father issuing your vocabulary. I had a settlement, a mother, and presently two children who lived. One does not table motions in a house whose drainage one is still mapping.”

“I am —” He tries the apology drafts in the dark and finds them all, like the one he abandoned for Transtiberim, addressed to the wrong person in the wrong currency. Servilia, who can hear drafts the way musicians hear tuning, interrupts the attempt at cost to nobody.

“Do not perform it tonight. You have had a death become sayable, a tablet become readable, and a daughter become arithmetic, all before the lamps. The house has a policy about doing two of those at once; we learned it from a woman who holds our olives.” It comes out without acid, an entry read in the upright hand. “What does your father advise, in the document? It was written by a Gnaeus, Lentulus. It will have instructions. They will be excellently drafted and a generation too late in both directions.”

“‘Do nothing dramatic. Settle it. Choose better.’”

She is silent for exactly as long as a clerk verifying standing should be silent, and no longer. “Then for once the estate papers and I are in agreement. Frame the phenomenon.” A breath, in the posture of sleep entirely given up now, though her eyes remain closed as a matter of constitutional form: some things in this marriage are still negotiated without the vulnerability of looking. “The girl across the river — I will call her that tonight; tomorrow we may be issued better words at a higher rate — has a father dying and a betrothal being inspected. She does not have, unless Antonia is losing her grip in her old age, a senator due at her door with his conscience in a carrying chair. Money she can use, in a form with a hem she can show her future mother-in-law. Information she can keep, at an hour somebody she trusts chooses. Those are settlements. The rest is us, imposing a tax and calling it remorse. Your father had a phrase for that too, I collect.”

“He had phrases for most of it. It was his whole technology.”

“Then let the technology rust.” Servilia turns, at last, toward him in the dark. The rain has settled into the house's old rhythm entirely: compluvium, basin, childhood lessons, clients' weather, a fuller's cough in another quarter of the same city, everything arriving in the order of the evening at last. “I married a settlement, Lentulus, and I made it work like rain on a roof — by finding the holes. You will not now drill a new one over your daughter's bed in either house because a dead man has finally filed his paperwork. Are we in agreement, or shall I have the steward minute us?”

“We are in agreement,” he says, and it is, after not olives, the most intimate sentence available for cataloguing this year.

“Since the oysters,” she says. “Nineteen years. Sleep, Lentulus. Tomorrow you have a committee. Committees are how this family thinks. God knows it isn't how it acts.”

Chapter Twelve

Negotiations

. . .

They meet at last because Rome, which has been conducting their correspondence through clerks and committees and unsigned walks across the city, finally requires a room. The room is neutral the way a knife is neutral between hands: the back office of the Greek banker at the Basilica, smelling of cedar and other people's solvency, with two chairs and a brazier and a slave who withdraws after the watered wine with the deafness that is his employer's true product.

Antonia arrives first, because in another's office the first arrival owns the silence. Lentulus arrives with rain still in the weave of his cloak, and stands — she remembers this, her body remembers it before she can file it — taking the room the way he used to take a page of Greek, top to bottom, before allowing himself the beginning.

She has dressed for the Basilica the way her house dresses a room for men who must not be allowed to mistake the occasion: plainly, at full price. No jewellery a clerk could describe. A veil arranged in the style women use for temples and assignations of state. Diomedes walks two paces behind with a document case containing nothing the morning is permitted to require — copies, all; originals live with the Greek, with the notary, and in a third place Diomedes has never been told, a piece of tradecraft Antonia maintains even against loyalty, on the principle Eirene phrases as nobody should be the only copy of you, love, including us.

“If he offers terms in writing,” Diomedes says, at the corner where the Basilica's shade begins to govern the temperature of the talk, “madam will not sign in the room.”

“If he offers terms in writing I shall suspect him of being an impostor in a borrowed life. Lentulus inhabits paper the way fish inhabit apologies, Diomedes: reluctantly, and only after it has been presented as water."

The Greek's outer office is doing its usual imitation of a temple where the god is discretion. A Spanish silver man is not negotiating a loan over a sample ingot he keeps putting back into its cloth. A widow of equestrian family, chaperoned by a freedwoman of ferocious respectability — Antonia knows the pair; the widow hears unsuitable music in a certain house on the Caelian and has lately been observed laughing at it — is settling a grandson's expectations in a voice that suggests the grandson is a foreign policy. Their eyes meet Antonia's across the room: client to proprietor, a current of perfect, municipal blankness. Nobody is in this office. That is what the office sells. The Greek, coming himself from the cedar door to perform the morning's pièce — he performs one a day, like a sacrifice, to remind the room who owns the silence — receives the widow's papers, declines the silver man's ingot with a courtesy that will cost the silver man a quarter point by Thursday, and inclines his head to Antonia in the smallest degree a rich man can manage, etcetera. She has seen Avidius do it since, over fish. It is apparently denominational.

"The small room is prepared," Eutyches says, in Latin with the faintest Aegean weather on it. "The senator's man asked for the small room. I informed him the small room was engaged for a lady's business, which had the advantage of being true in every particular his master will check."

"You are a theologian, Eutyches."

"I am a banker, madam. We let the truth work in several rooms at once and charge by the door."

Across the city, at approximately the same inclination of a rich Greek head, Lentulus is being shaved for a negotiation his household believes to be an aqueduct inspection. Felix works in silence until the razor reaches the scar's neighbourhood, where professional tact requires, as always, the question that is not a question.

“Leave it,” Lentulus says, before it can be asked. “It has kept its appointment for twenty-one years. I am keeping mine at the Basilica.”

“Then today is an anniversary, dominus,” Felix says, and wipes the blade, and says nothing else, being a man who has shaved three consuls and buried two and knows exactly which of the morning's sentences are his to carry out of the room. It comes to Lentulus, watching his own face reassemble in the dented bronze — senator, debtor, forwarding address — that he has been dressed by this house for every consequential entrance of his life: muster, marriage, consulship (suffect, footnoted), his father's will-reading, his daughter's betrothal dinners. The hands change; the liturgy doesn't. Only once was he not dressed by the house for a consequential entrance, and it was not an entrance, it was a corridor, and she was holding a mirror steady, and the whole of the rest is paperwork.

Onesimus has arranged the Basilica as if for somebody else's conscience, as instructed. There is no livery to be read. There is a Greek chair for the standing problem of a senator's dignity, a brazier, watered wine of a neutrality that would shame a treaty, and the certain knowledge, carried in by both parties like weather, that the Greek in the next room holds — in different hands, under different names, in wax that melts quarterly as a matter of policy — the financial ruin of each of them in its most portable form, and will use neither, today, except as furniture.

That is what neutral means, Antonia thinks, taking the silence-owning chair while Diomedes withdraws to be nobody in the outer office. Not empty. Armed, on both sides, with the doors shut. She folds her hands in the order she has decided. First the committee. First the paper. First the things that can be entered in books. If there is to be a fourth thing in this room, it will arrive, like everything else she has survived, over the threshold in his mouth or not at all. She has rehearsed the fire drill. She knows which door not to open under smoke. What she has not rehearsed — she logs it now, with Diomedes precision, in the third book, behind the ribs — is what to do if he opens it for her, from his side, quietly, like a man at last asking the price in the right shop.

“You sent for me,” he says.

“The Greek sent for us. He has a talent for rooms.” She does not stand. A woman who owns the silence does not surrender the chair. “Your committee has cost me three bookings and gained me a prefect's compliment on my paperwork. I call that, overall, an expensive compliment. I have come to close the account.”

“I did not arrange the man's death to close anything.”

“I know.” She looks at him. “That is how I know it was his heart. If you had arranged it, Lentulus, it would have worked.”

It is the first joke either of them has made to the other in twenty-one years, and it lands between them like a cup set down too hard on glass. Something in his face — she watches it the way she watches a guest's face at the fish course, for the truth under the arrangement, chooses not to pursue it. Business. They are good at business. It is the language Rome taught them both, in different schools with the same fees.

“The committee reports in ten days,” he says. “It will recommend a general registry and quarterly inspection. General, Antonia. Twenty houses. Yours first on the list only by alphabet, which in Latin is mercifully early for nobody.”

“Acilius has been bathing you.”

“Acilius has been right. It happens, even to consuls.” He sits. The chairs are Greek, too low for the dignity of a senator, and he conquers this by ignoring it, a technique his family has applied to provinces. “In return, I ask the house to be — discreet — about young men of senatorial family until the vintage. My daughter's marriage is in negotiation. You know this. Your singer could probably recite the dowry figures.”

“Daphne sings, Lentulus. It is your son who recites.”

A beat. The brazier ticks. Somewhere beyond the cedar door the Greek's fortune goes on being made out of exactly this: two Romans reaching the part they came for by the road they can both describe as the long way round.

“Define discreet,” Antonia says, because she has never in twenty years let a man of his family issue her an adjective without presenting its papers. “In this city it usually means the women are silent in a more expensive register.”

“It means your door-book and my son's name keep separate quarters until Cornelia is married.” He says it flatly, a man stating a case before he has been briefed and hating the advocate. “It means if Marcus comes, Barbatus finds the house full. It means Daphne—” He stops at the singer's name the way men stop at a threshold in a house they are inspecting at dawn. “It means no second necklace becomes a baths story with my family's name for a clasp.”

“The necklace was glass, Lentulus. Its return was the education. Your son is twenty, briefly truthful, and learning manners at the full rate. If Rome must gossip about him, it will do it without my glass.” She lets the brazier tick once. “Barbatus can find the house full on the evenings your committee sits. He will enjoy it; it gives the door a constitution. Beyond that, I do not police your heir for his father's convenience at a discount. If the Cornelii want Marcus invisible, the Cornelii may purchase his invisibility themselves. I believe Syria is the traditional shop.”

It lands. She watches it land — guest's face at the fish course, the truth under the arrangement: not anger, which would be negotiable, but the small, wry Senate mouth that precedes concessions he will later describe as strategy. “You would have made an advocate.”

“I would have made several advocates unemployed. It is not the same career.” Antonia un-folds one hand and lays it flat on the cedar table between them, palm down, the gesture she uses in her own house to stop a sauce being sent out underdone. “Now the registry. Quarterly, by appointment, at stated hours when women may be dressed for an audience with the state instead of surprised by one. Papers shown to officials who can read them, in rooms that are not bedrooms. Minors and the unfree given the same entry as citizens — a name, a status, a person whose no—” She chooses the next words the way she chooses seating, for their geography. “A house to keep a person at all must be able to show her refusal exists somewhere in the paperwork. Put it better in Latin. I am told you draft.”

The sentence goes into him and stays. She can see it doing what sentences do in Lentulus when they are going to be carried for years: it finds the locked room and knocks once, correctly. Outside, the Basilica bargains on. Inside, a senator of ancient lineage looks at a freedwoman's hand flat on his banker's table and hears, as if from a committee he has not yet survived, his own future clause being dictated to him by its intended casualty, in the order of the evening.

“No house to profit—” he begins, half aloud, the drafting habit outrunning the statesmanship.

“Finish it at your leisure. I am not in the room to invoice you for authorship.” She withdraws the hand. “Rome will attribute it to a Cornelius with a conscience, and my women will cite it over their contracts, and both of us will have got our preferred anthems out of one sentence. That, Lentulus, is what a settlement looks like in my trade. Yours takes longer and has flutes.”

He laughs then — not the cup-on-glass laugh of the first joke, something shorter and less managed, a sound she last heard in a house that no longer stands, over scansion, in a corridor. Her body files it before she can. She lets the filing happen and keeps her face on business, because business is the language they are both still fluent in, and because the next item on her private agenda has been sitting in the Greek's strongbox earning like furniture for two quarters and it is time it was introduced to its debtor.

“I have a further matter,” Antonia says, in the voice she uses for menus and mercy, “of paper. The Greek will confirm the position if you require it in his hand rather than mine. Loans against Campanian land, rolled twice, now lodged — having passed through the hands of persons who prefer not to hold a senator's vintage in their own cellar — with an investor who files quarterly.” She watches the understanding arrive. It arrives the way age has arrived at his temples: visibly, if you know the face. “I am not calling it in. I am telling you it exists because a weapon a man does not know about is only an asset, and I did not come here to be merely rich at you.”

“How much of it?”

“Enough.” She folds her hands. “I learned that word from men who lend. I find it improves with use.”

“You want the committee buried.”

“I want what you have already offered because Acilius explained the steam to you. A general registry, paid quarterly, like the tax, like the licence, like everything else in my life that Rome condemns and invoices.” She stands, and the room rearranges itself around the single fact of her standing, as rooms have done for her since Baiae. “I have paid this city for twenty years to be let alone in a house I built out of stairs. I will go on paying. It is my civic religion. But I will not be taxed in shame as well as coin because a Cornelius needs Syria to look like cleanliness. We are finished. Unless—”

“Unless,” he says.

She has rehearsed this too, the way she rehearses fire procedures and banquet seating: knowing the exact door she must not open under smoke. She looks at him — forty-five, grey-templed, shoulder that aches in warm water, hands that once set a stylus behind an ear as if it were a — no: that is the smoke. Follow the drill. “Unless there is any matter between our houses that your committee has not minuted. In which case the Greek has other rooms, and better wine than this, and we are both too old for the back street.”

He is very still. The brazier ticks again, an insect noise, an accounting. “There is a sealed matter,” Lentulus says, “that I have recently unsealed.”

“Then we will need the other room,” Antonia says. And is surprised — she logs it with Diomedes precision, beneath the ribs, where the house's third set of books has always been kept — that her voice does not shake on any figure at all.

There is a kind of negotiation the Basilica performs with the doors open, in which nobody appears to be conceding anything and yet, by the afternoon, sums have moved into better light. The Greek conducts it at the speed of furniture. He allows a man's first figure to stand in the small room until it has heard itself in the local acoustics. Often the figure revises its own tailoring without anybody laying a hand on it.

Diomedes watches this process with the professional envy of a man who usually has to manufacture silence from noisier material.

"You charge for the interval?" he asks, when a client has left to consult a partner who is probably his own conscience in a different cloak.

"I charge for documents," the Greek says. "Intervals are included where character requires assembly."

Antonia has learned from him that a price is not always a number. Sometimes it is the right to appear unbought while selling. Sometimes it is the day of payment. Sometimes—most expensively—it is a form of words that will let a man go back to his house and describe a concession as a tradition.

Today the tradition under design has an olive smell.

"The estate wants time," the agent says, for the third time in increasingly patrician Greek.

"The estate has had three centuries," Antonia says in Latin. "It may rent a quarter at the market rate."

The Greek neither translates nor mitigates. It is one of the silences that make his outer office such a good room in which to find out what one actually meant.

Diomedes produces a copy, then another. Paper begins to acquire company. Hands that were recently performing ancestry are now reaching for seals with the practical hunger of people closing shutters before weather. Nothing has been forgiven. Nothing has been disguised as patronage. The figures sit there, unglamorous as water in a correctly cut channel, and are allowed to find their level because no one in the room is being paid to pretend the level is a family crest.

■

The Greek's other room has a window, which is how she knows it is for the expensive truths. The Forum below goes about its immortal afternoon: litigants, changers, the column-drums inching on their rollers toward a war already won and not yet tall enough to read. Lentulus stands at the window because the sentence he is carrying has no chair designed for it in any room he owns.

“My father left a tablet,” he says. “I opened it last night. Nine years late. We are a family that opens things late and calls it dignity — those are his words; I am reduced to quoting him, which he would count as the estate settling itself.”

Antonia waits. Waiting is a skill she has, like counting in darkness. She can do it with her whole body arranged to look as if she were doing something else.

“The child lived.”

The room does not change. That is the thing she will remember: the drums on their rollers, the ticking brazier, a money-changer's laugh arriving whole through cedar and glass. The world declining to fall down over the oldest news in it.

“I know,” she says.

She watches it cross him — that she knows, that she arrived at the most expensive truth in Rome ahead of its legal owner, through thread — and what crosses him, under the statesmanship, is a young man of twenty-four being corrected on his scansion by a girl with a stylus behind her ear. Unpaid, she had said of the faithful woman at the loom. He had laughed. It had been the laugh that did everything, in the locked room, on the stairs.

“By what route?” he asks at last. “Forgive the Basilica manners. In this building one asks for the route before the substance. It may be a—” His mouth finds a word he does not use. “A family technology.”

“Thread,” Antonia says. “A Greek buying it at the seller's price. A tanner's widow. A guild book with a better column than the Senate's.”

She gives him the order of the evening in her own case, since he gave her the phrase, unpaid, and a debt is a debt in this room if anywhere on earth. The vats, Diomedes' patience, the hennaed fact, the money stopping when the men who paid to forget had finished dying. She does not give him Baiae. Baiae is not on this agenda; Baiae has been itemised once today already, by a dead man on wax, and she will not have her stairs performing in a banker's window room as evidence. She gives him the years as figures, because figures, she has it on good authority, are his poetry. “Nineteen. Arrived, as the guild so beautifully files it. Taught to read by a woman who counted stairs so they wouldn't count her. Counting, always, before you ask. It is apparently the family trade, on every bank of the river.”

“Alive and —” Lentulus stops. There are words a man's furniture contains that he is only now dusting. “Flourishing is a banker's word. Let me do better. Is she unharmed, Antonia, by the manner of her keeping?”

“She is harmed by everything Rome charges her class for, and by nothing her parents —” Antonia deploys the word the dealer's books never contained, “— in Transtiberim could keep off her with the money stopped. She is betrothed to the bakery. Her future mother-in-law inspects her reading as a risk to the yeast. Her father is dying at the pace water finds things, joking from the rail. She has been told nothing except by omission, which is this city's first language, as you and I have grammars to prove. So: no, she is not unharmed, Lentulus. Nobody in this story is, except possibly the crocodile in Serapion's version. She is alive, and pointed, and hers. That is the sum I found it under.”

At the window, not seeing the Forum's immortal afternoon in any sense a foreman would accept, Lentulus says, “I asked my father once.”

“I know the sentence he sold you.” She does not make him produce it. It is the one mercy available in the room at these rates. “Your tablet evidently invoices it better than I can.”

“It says the person wronged is not me.”

“Then for once the estate papers and I are in agreement. Do not make me say so in the Senate.” It comes out drier than she priced it, and he — damn him, damn the grey at his temples and the shoulder that aches in warm water and the boy of twenty-four still standing in the ruin like a column drum left on rollers — he comes within an ace of smiling, and the room does not change, and the drums below go on inching a war toward legibility, and that, she thinks, is how the world actually performs its earthquakes: in a banker's back room, between the courses, with nobody's hands doing anything recordable at all.

“My wife will have known the route too,” he says quietly. “Servilia hears things at the speed other people decide. When I tell her — when I confirm to her, after nineteen years of her knowing at oyster-depth — she will ask what I intend in the exact language of logistics. She made a marriage work like rain on a roof. It is only fair to warn a creditor.”

“Warn her that I count faster.” Antonia lets the lamp into it — the smallest warmth, as before, and then the lamp is trimmed and they are back to business, because business is what will fill a bakehouse share and keep a fuller’s guild book dull, and dull, in both their houses tonight, is a form of love Rome will never carve. “The settlement, Lentulus. Not charity, we are agreed. Not a scene, we are agreed twice, in your father's Latin and mine. Tools, extended. The oven share, through the guild as a Baiae bequest: the mistress her mother served, dying conveniently rich and childless, two quarters ago; Diomedes will draft her posthumously, he has a hand for the dead. A sum for Vibius's pyre that arrives as guild money, because a fuller who held a rail and joked is not to be buried at a senator's discount. Nothing with your name, my name, a date in the old emperor's winter, or a smell of the Palatine. If you cannot settle it without spending her, then, in the phrase your family is buying from me this year at a premium — you are not to settle it.”

“I can settle it.” He turns from the window decisively, the statesmanship reassembling over the forwarding address like a toga over a shoulder that aches. “Through Soter, through the guild, through the Greek's other rooms. Papers that point at Campania and die there. Servilia will see the drafts. She has a better eye for a hem—" He catches the metaphor arriving from across the river and lets it stand. "—for respectability, than any clerk alive. On those terms, Antonia."

"On those terms," she says, "the house accepts your father's apology, at the rate of interest he so carefully specified: none to himself, all of it forward."

"Across the river," he says. "A fuller's household."

"Vibia Prima. Nineteen. She sews for my house. She is betrothed to a baker and corrects your son's manners. She counts stitches with her mouth open." Antonia's hands find each other and are correctly folded before she has decided anything. "She does not know. She will be told by me, when I judge it, in the order of the evening — you may invoice me for the phrase; it was good advice — and not as a weapon in a committee war or a dowry negotiation or a governor's application. She is not paper, Lentulus. She is the one thing in Rome I did not build, and I will not have the Cornelii spending her."

"My father spent her. In advance, at a discount." He turns from the window. "I am not here to reclaim her, Antonia. A nineteen-year-old with a trade and a betrothal is not property to be refiled because two people have finally audited their twenties. I am here to tell you that I know, a day after knowing, and that my wife—" his mouth makes the small, wry shape that in the Senate precedes a concession "—has known since the oysters, apparently, and we will settle money on the household in a form that cannot be traced to the Palatine. Not charity. A debt. My father was precise about the currency, at the end."

"The fuller is dying," Antonia says. "Slowly, of the cough they all get, drinking their trade. Settle it as a widow's portion for a wife already dead and he will refuse it. Settle it as Prima's dowry, enlarged — tools, and a share in the bakehouse, paid through the fullers' guild as a bequest from a Baiae mistress her mother served — and the baker's mother will inspect it like a hem and find it respectable. I have thought about this, Lentulus. I have had, by my count, rather longer with the information than you.”

“By how long?”

“Four days.” She lets the smallest warmth into it, the way a lamp is let into a room. “I count faster. It is my civic religion.”

The Greek comes in when the expensive truths have had their hour, because Eutyches has an ear, through cedar, for the moment a conversation stops needing a room and starts needing a receipt. He carries nothing. In his office, carrying nothing is the highest denomination; clerks exist to have hands. He looks at his two clients — neither of whom, officially, is in his office today, at this hour, in these chairs — with the expression of a man pricing weather over two harbours he insures.

“Madam. Senator. The small room gives satisfaction?”

“The small room is a lesson in architecture, Eutyches,” Antonia says. “My compliments to its deafness.”

“The house is always better for a compliment it cannot record.” He does not sit. Bankers in their own rooms are like priests in temples: sitting is for the laity. “There are matters the senator's man and madam's Diomedes have been not drafting in my outer office for some twenty minutes. Drafts of that quality usually require a Greek to become invisible in a third language. Guild money, I apprehend. Campania. Tools. An oven with a bequest for a figurehead.” He spreads empty hands, a liturgy. “I apprehend nothing. Let us proceed as if apprehension were my trade, which in the evenings, madam, as you taught me over a silversmith's plate, it is.”

It takes eleven minutes. Antonia counts them against Diomedes' breathing in the outer office, audible, she would swear in any inquiry, through cedar. Sums are mentioned the way fleets are mentioned at her tables, as climates rather than claims. The Baiae mistress is invented with a sound estate and a death at the right quarter. The fullers' guild becomes, on paper, what it has always been in fact: the place where decency keeps its chest. Soter, produced from the outer office with a colleague's tan still on him, bows to Antonia with an exactness that tells her he knows, and to Lentulus with an exactness that tells her he will forget, in the manner of his profession, which is also Onesimus', which is also, if they are all honest in this building for once, hers.

Nobody signs anything with a name that occurs in any history Rome will write. That is the whole ceremony. It is, Antonia thinks, watching a Cornelius put his seal — not the cornel sprig; a steward's seal, a working seal, chosen for the walk across the city — to a guild bequest drafted by her bookkeeper's second hand, the first entirely honourable document his family has produced in this matter in twenty-one years. The honour consists, precisely, in its being a well-made lie in the service of a kept girl's tools. Rome runs on such documents the way it runs on aqueducts: what is sent downhill arrives; the maps claim it always did; the lettering, where it works, is small and unglamorous.

In the outer office the Spanish silver man is still not negotiating his loan; the equestrian widow's freedwoman chaperone is folding expectations into a document case with a grandmother's severity. Diomedes falls in two paces behind Antonia without a word. Onesimus — for a man arranging somebody else's conscience, he has materialised with a senator's dry cloak over his arm as if the Basilica rained indoors — falls in behind Lentulus at the identical, professional distance. The two retainerships pass each other in the doorway with the merest acknowledgement, fellow-craftsmen at a job of work: we were never an inquiry.

At the Basilica steps the afternoon has gone the colour of wet bronze. Lentulus stops — against policy, against logistics, against Servilia's whole science of arrangement, he stops in a public place beside a veiled woman whose house his committee inspected at dawn a quarter ago, in view of litigants, changers, and a man selling little clay columns no taller than a thumb, already spiralled, already triumphant.

“You count faster,” he says. “It is minuted.”

“See that the minutes are general, eventual and dull, Lentulus.” She does not look up from the business of descending steps in a veil at the correct angle for a woman of no family attaining the street without assistance. “And see to the clause. I am told Athens is asking who in Rome can draft. Athletics aside, it would be a waste of a Greek education — yours, your tutors', mine — if the answer were Postumus.”

He descends on his side of the stair, into his people's order. She descends on hers, into Diomedes' two paces and the walk uphill to a house that will want its mistress back by sections: fires first, then women, then money, then truth, in the proportions that keep all four lit. Neither of them looks back. Looking back, on Basilica steps, in sight of the changers, would be a scene, and scenes are taxed to women, and they are both — it has taken them until their forties and a banker's cedar to learn it on the same afternoon — finished with being billed for other people's theatre.

Diomedes does not ask until the Caelian street. Even then he asks in bookkeeper's Greek, two paces back, at the gradient where the muleteers swear and a man's breath is his own again: “The account, madam?”

“Closed in the first book. Open in a fourth.” Antonia passes the fuller’s workshop whose lamps her house keeps filled at a neighbour's rate, and the dealer's daughter who was married out of her dining room waves from a door with a baby already itemised on her hip like good news. “We have acquired, Diomedes, a general registry, a clause in draft, an oven in Transtiberim and an understanding with a dead man's apologies. Enter the first three at their market prices.”

“And the fourth?”

“Leave the column blank.” Barbatus is opening her own door with the weather of him, lamps coming up by sections behind his shoulders, the house performing its evening overture: water, linen, Ammonius disputing saffron with a continent. “A completed book, somebody across the river says, is a dead one. We are in the keeping business, Diomedes. We leave spaces where the count isn't finished.”

Below, the drums have stopped for the day; a foreman's shout, the long creak of history parking itself. The two of them stand in a banker's back room between a dead father's Latin and a living daughter's needle, each in possession of the other's ruin in its most portable form — his olives in her book, his name in her locked room, her past in his cupboard — and what they make there, without touching, without the back street or the brazier or any of the instruments their younger selves mistook for fate, is the first entry in a ledger neither of them will ever show the tax office: an agreement to be, for once, jointly and severally, careful at somebody else's expense no longer.

Chapter Thirteen

Cornelia's Voice

. . .

Cornelia sings at the house of the Acilii with her mother's instructions arranged inside her like furniture in a room she is permitted to use but not to own: one song, not the Greek; bow to the empress's freedwoman first, because power sits in odd chairs; if the Avidii are there, they are to be greeted as old friends of the family, which by the vintage, the gods and the Greek banker's other rooms willing, they will be able to pretend to have been for years.

The preparations take the whole of the morning, which is the point of them. A girl who is to sing one song at the Acilii must be got ready as though for a small, decorous campaign: the hair dressed and then, at her mother's instruction, undressed by half a degree, so that it reads as nature improved by money rather than money improved by nature; the dress chosen from three whose differences are invisible to men and deafening to women; the music copied fair by the master, although Cornelia knows both songs the way she knows the stairs in the dark, because a girl seen to need no copy is a girl advertising a memory, and a memory, in a marriageable daughter, is only an asset if it can be mistaken for obedience.

“That one,” Servilia says, of the middle dress.

“It is the one I wore to the Fabii.”

“Then the Fabii will think we own one good dress and the Acilii will think we own three. Both impressions have their uses.” Her mother is not looking at the dress. She is looking at Cornelia's hands, which have been crushing the edge of the music roll since the second hour. “Hands.”

Cornelia puts them flat on her knees, where hands in this family go to be governed. Once, when she was nine, she asked why the women in the house were always being told about their hands — hold still, hold steady, do not let the master touch the wrist — and Servilia said, “Because hands confess. Faces in this family have advocates. Hands say what the person costs before the person has agreed to the price.” Nine is young to be given the whole constitution. Cornelia has been legislating for her hands ever since.

The music master arrives with his metaphors in good order. He is to warm the voice without spending it, a distinction he explains by reference to racehorses, kilns, and — finding his range at last — lamps: trimmed, not lit. “The Roman song sits here,” he says, not touching her, describing a place in the air somewhere below her collarbone as if it were a province he governs by map. “The Greek sits lower. It is why men prefer it and mothers ration it. A voice that comes from lower down sounds as though it had travelled.”

“Hasn't it?”

“It has travelled from Ionia, dominus's daughter, by way of every dining room between Smyrna and the Subura. That is the difficulty. Rome likes its imports taxed and its daughters domestic.” He hears himself and bows to the door where Servilia is not, quite, standing. “One song. The Roman.”

She warms the voice. The house goes about its hearing of her in the way it has since she was small: a pause in the corridor traffic that nobody minutes, a slave with a tray taking the long way past the music room, Marcus in the garden pretending to be reading accounts he has been specifically forbidden to find entertaining. When she passes his bench with the roll correctly held — not crushed; the hands have learned something this month, though not in time for this morning's inspection — he says, without looking up, “Sing the Greek one and blame the wine.”

“There is no wine for girls at the Acilii.”

“Blame the architecture. It's Greek.” He looks up then. Brother and sister in this family are allies in the limited, heavily taxed way of people who share parents, ancestors, and a growing suspicion that the shares were distributed unequally. “Will the ship be there?”

“Young Avidius—”

“The ship. With ballast.”

“He is expected. I am to greet his family as old friends. We have been old friends, by next vintage, for several years.” She sits, unasked, on the other end of the bench, which puts three feet of wet stone and the entire Roman law of guardianship between them, an intimacy. “Marcus. When you go to the house on the Caelian —”

“I don't.”

“— when Rome goes to the house on the Caelian, then: do the women there sing the Greek ones?”

Marcus considers the accounts with the seriousness of a man discovering a fourth set of books. “They sing what the room can afford,” he says. “Daphne sings a street song slowed down until it sounds like the truth at a funeral. Philomela sings Greek for people who'd know. It's her phrase.” A pause in which he is visibly deciding how much of the plumbing to show a sister the house is scheduled to launch like a ship herself. “They're paid, Cornelia. That's the part father can't get read into the minutes, for or against. A woman who is paid can stop a song. Have you ever seen one stop a song at a dinner here?”

She has seen songs stopped by a cough, by a slipped string, by her mother's glance arriving like weather. She has never seen a singer at the Palatine house stop a song because she had finished the amount of herself the fee had purchased. She files the thought under the things she is not to repeat at the Acilii, which by the fourth hour is the most crowded room in her.

The litter is called. The household deploys: mother, daughter, master at a professional distance, music in its case like an infant in state. Servilia, arranging herself with the economy of a general who has already won the war in the supply lines, says, “The empress's freedwoman's name is Epicharis. She was Plotina's hairdresser and is now, in effect, a ministry. You will bow to her before the Acilia because Acilia will expect it of us and Epicharis will not, which is why it must be done. Power, Cornelia, sits in odd chairs, and it remembers who saw the chair."

"Will she ask for the Greek one?"

"She will ask for nothing. Ministries don't. Rooms ask, on their behalf, later."

Cornelia watches the Palatine go past the litter's curtain in bright slices, like light through shutters: a client hurrying home with his morning still on his face, a girl her own age carrying a basket twice her courage up a lane, a fuller's boy with a garment over his arm picking his way through the traffic like a man escorting a relative. Somewhere behind her, in the house she is leaving for the afternoon, a father is telling a committee what women are for in law. Somewhere ahead, in a room where the furniture of instructions is already arranged inside her, she is to be evidence in one song, not the Greek. She puts her hands flat on her knees, where hands go to be governed, and thinks, with her grandfather's ear and her mother's discipline, about the exact note on which a kept house, in the Roman song, survives its war. She holds it, soundlessly, all the way there.

The room receives them in its tiers. Cornelia has been reading rooms all her life the way other girls read music — and she is good at music; let the two literacies be minuted together. Nearest the windows, where the winter light comes in hard and truthful, the older women sit with the thorough nothing on their faces that her own family practises at moments of unminuted honesty. They are the assessors. No one has appointed them; Rome does not appoint its real committees. Below them, in the room's softer middle, the girls of this season are arranged like a border of flowers, each the same, each slightly alive with difference: two Fabiae who have been taught to play as one instrument, a little Acilia with a cough she is trying to convert into delicacy, a foreign heiress from Narbo whose Latin has an accent her mother describes as weather and the room prices as acreage.

Epicharis the empress's freedwoman is sitting in the odd chair. It is, in fact, too low for the dignity she has acquired since the hairdressing years, and she conquers it by ignoring it, a technique Cornelia has lately seen applied to Greek chairs in bankers' offices, though she does not know she has seen it, not in so many images. She is fifty, unpainted, dressed in the grey that costs more than colour, and when Cornelia bows to her first — before the Acilia, as instructed, while the room's temperature changes by the half degree her mother predicted — Epicharis acknowledges it with the precision of a woman who has spent twenty years close enough to an empress's head to hear power think.

"You sing," she says. It is not a question. Ministries don't.

"I am to sing one song, domina."

"How many do you have?"

The assessors' faces do their thorough nothing at a higher rate of interest. Servilia, three paces away and apparently examining a hanging with a connoisseur's outrage, becomes absolutely still in the place where other people listen.

"I have the Greek ones for my lesson," Cornelia says, "and the Roman ones for company. It is a family registry."

Epicharis looks at her for a moment with the expression of a woman pricing a room she might one day have to dress. "Then sing the registered one beautifully, child. Plotina says half of Rome's government is knowing which of your assets to minute." She turns back to the Acilia with the question that releases the room, and the afternoon is saved, and Cornelia — who has been educated well above the safety limit, and who heard, under the sentence, its understudy waiting in the wings — files assets to minute in the crowded room of things she is not to repeat. It has, by now, a waiting list.

The other girls sing first because the Acilii, like Antonia's house and the Senate, understand programme as ballast. The Fabiae perform a duet about sisters awaiting a fleet, in close harmony and matching dresses, which the assessors receive as a prospectus: two dowries, one management, no sudden movements. The little Acilia sings to her cough and is applauded for the effort, which in this market is a way of saying her family's name will carry what her chest cannot. The Narbo heiress sings in a Latin that keeps being surprised by Gaul, and an elderly senator's widow two seats from Epicharis says, at the volume women use for remarks they intend to be overheard by history, “Acreage. It comes out in the vowels.”

Cornelia, in her place in the border, watches the room do its real work and finds she can suddenly see the joins in it — the way Prima, across the river, sees where a hem has been taken up for a second wearer. Nobody here is cruel. That is the discovery that frightens her, insofar as a girl with her hands correctly folded permits herself the word. Nobody is cruel; everybody is competent; the machine runs the way her father's clients' hour runs, on being seen to help in an order nobody can afford to dispute. A girl sings, is priced; another sings, is priced kindly; the soup of it all is excellent and the older women go home and set in train, with letters in upright hands, the next quarter's wars.

Only in the eddies — the supervised eddies, where cups are refilled and conversations are allowed to happen in sight of their inspectors — does the room produce anything that isn't in the programme. The Narbo heiress, marooned beside the refreshments with her vowels, tells Cornelia, in Greek much better than her Latin, that in her province girls learn letters from the estate accounts and nobody calls it a danger because someone has to catch the bailiffs. A young widow — twenty-five, rich, on her second filing by the city's assessors — describes, with the flat calm of a person reading a shipping forecast, the exact clause in her late husband's will that keeps her money out of her next husband's family; three girls listen the way clients listen at doors. And Epicharis, passing for more water with a ministry's indifference to stage management, says, of nobody in particular: “The empress maintains that a household register honestly kept is worth two poems about keeping house. She is very unfashionable.”

Then it is Cornelia's place in the programme. The master takes the far chair. Her mother becomes, at three paces, a country Cornelia will sing in but not emigrate from. She thinks of the room across the city where women are paid and can stop a song. She thinks of the note she held soundlessly all the way uphill, like a basket carried correctly. She sings.

She sings the Roman song, a setting of a poem about a woman keeping a house through a war — all the songs for girls are about women keeping houses through wars the men are having elsewhere, and Cornelia, who is sixteen and has been educated well above the safety limit, has begun to notice that the keeping is always the woman's glory and never her choice. She sings it beautifully. She has her Lentulus grandfather's ear and her mother's discipline, a combination that produces, in a drawing room, something perilously like feeling.

Young Avidius is there. He listens with his whole large, shipping-money attention and afterwards, in the supervised eddies of the room, says to her the thing that renews her mother's faith in the match and Cornelia's in humanity, which are not always the same faith: “You should sing the Greek one for people who'd know. My father says a thing wasted is a thing stolen twice.”

“Your father,” Cornelia says, “sounds like a warehouse.”

“He does. It's why there's money.” Avidius grins, unpatrician, unrepentant, entirely without the sullenness Marcus is currently touring Rome with as a philosophy. “I'm not clever like your brother. I'm not going to be a senator who quotes at you. Ships, accounts, a house that won't leak into the dining room — I can do those. If this marriage happens, nobody'll forbid your wrist to be touched by a music master. They'll just pay him better than your father does, so he respects the merchandise.” He winces. “That came out wrong.”

“It came out honestly,” Cornelia says, surprising them both, “which in my house is what coming out wrong is called.”

“It came out honestly,” his father says, from the other side of a tray of little cakes, arriving in the eddy precisely as a harbour dues negotiation would end it. Avidius the elder has ridden up from the docks with business still in his cloak and has been admitted to the Acilii's afternoon on the strength of a name the Cornelii are in the process of teaching Rome to pronounce as old friends. He takes in his son's wince, Cornelia's correct face, and the whole supervised situation with an evaluator's love. “He meant the master answers to the mistress.”

“I meant,” says young Avidius quickly, “the merchandise being the house—”

“Ballast,” says his father, with a joviality that promises a private conversation. “Ships, accounts, a house that won't leak. The young lady has the manifest.” He bows to Cornelia with the deep, practical bow of a man who has unloaded other people's empires and knows the weight of courtesy to the amphora. “You sang like a title deed, young lady.”

“Father.”

“I mean it well. A title deed is the most reassuring music in Rome. Ask your father—” He catches, not the error, but the geography, and converts it in mid-course with the grace he has been buying at such expense for his whole family. “Ask any landlord.”

Servilia materialises, as she materialises everywhere that matters in her children's lives, without seeming to have crossed the room. “The Acilia was saying, Avidius, that your ships came in under their time again.”

“They come in under their time because I pay men to tell me the truth about water. It is a heavy expense and there's no column for it.” He acknowledges the rescue with his eyes only; the rest of him, shipping and all, follows Servilia politely away into the assessed middle of the room, where men of his manufacture learn, year by year, how Roman the occasion requires them to be. Young Avidius is left with Cornelia in the supervised eddy and a silence that has suddenly become the most expensive item on either family's account.

“I do damage with compliments,” he says at last. “At home I pay porters. It's cheaper.”

“You could practise on the furniture.”

“I do. The furniture's ballast.” He grins, unrepaired, and then — the thing Cornelia will remember when the contracts are being read to her quickly, with the clause about her dowry glossed at speed — he gives up performing and looks, for a moment, like someone standing in a doorway he has paid to have measured. “I know what my family costs yours to be seen with. In their books it's entered as new.”

“Mine enters yours as ballast,” Cornelia says, surprising them both for the second time in one afternoon. “It is why the cargo arrives. My brother explained it. He is collecting nautical explanations this winter, the way other people collect jet.”

“I'm not cargo,” he says.

“No,” she says. “Neither am I.”

They are both sixteen and twenty-odd, respectable and supervised, statues in an eddy, and for eleven seconds — counted, later, by nobody who was present in any column the guild keeps — they discuss a marriage the way the house on the Caelian is reported to discuss everything: in the order of the evening, at their own prices, with the thread separate. Then the music mistress of the Acilii, who has a timetable where a heart should be for professional purposes, announces the refreshments in the garden room, and the eddy is drained, and young Avidius bows to Cornelia exactly as a man bows to cargo he has decided, on reflection, is a person.

On the way home the litter does its slices again, in reverse. Servilia does not ask what was said. She has, after all, been reading shoulders for thirty years; the words are the part a family can afford to lose. What she says, as the curtain lets in the cattle-market smell and the sound of someone else's Rome being driven home for the night, is: “Epicharis will report the phrase family registry to Plotina. It will do you good in a room you will never see. That is how sentences survive in the capital, Cornelia. They find work in the household of the period.”

“Mother. If I marry the Avidius boy—”

“When terms are concluded.”

“—will I be allowed to see the terms?”

The litter sways at a corner. Through the curtain the evening is arriving in sections, lit from the back: a baker's door with its day nearly sold, a fuller's boy carrying a clean garment like a person being escorted, lamplight beginning its second shift in a thousand rooms where women keep houses standing and call it nothing at all. Servilia's hands, in the dim, do the thing hands in this family are legislated against: they confess. For one moment they are neither arranged nor instructing; they lie in her lap like tired animals, and Cornelia sees their backs, and the twenty years of re-roping roofs and paying for silence prospectively in them, and loves her mother with a ferocity that has nowhere acceptable to go and therefore goes, as everything in her does this year, into the music.

“You will see the terms when I am satisfied you can use them,” Servilia says, in the voice of a woman opening a window in a locked room and standing well back from what the light does. “That is more than my mother issued me. Spend it better.”

Servilia, watching from across the room with a mother's optics — able to read a conversation by its shoulders at forty paces — revises, by perhaps half a degree, her private estimate of the Avidii. Money from grain. A boy who can wince. There have been worse foundations under the Cornelii; she can name two without leaving her own marriage.

The music master has been renegotiated. Nobody calls it that, because in Servilia’s household renegotiation is what happens to peace treaties and laundry arrangements, not to a man with a tuning fork and a professional tenderness about wrists. He is paid quarterly, in advance, in a schedule bearing more initials than some provincial decrees. The effect on his teaching is miraculous. He discovers that breath can be corrected by words. He discovers that Cornelia’s questions cannot be paid off by calling them temperament.

“Again,” he says, “but with less harbour.”

“The harbour is the audience,” Cornelia says.

“The harbour is an influence. The audience is your mother.”

From her chair Servilia does not look up from accounts she has already memorised. “I am not an audience. I am weather.”

The Greek song proceeds. In the middle verse, where the woman keeps the house while men are elsewhere becoming verses, Cornelia slows the line by a breath. The master raises a finger, considers the schedule, and lowers it into a note on phrasing.

“It is not incorrect,” he concedes.

“You may carve that on my education.”

“It would not survive weather.”

Servilia turns a page. She has begun to understand, with an irritation not wholly separable from pride, that her daughter’s voice is not a box in which the family stores accomplishments. It is a room with its own acoustics. Sound goes where the architecture is honest.

After the lesson Cornelia asks for a copy of the music payments “for my box”.

The master looks to Servilia as if a new tax had been proposed in song.

“Secretary will supply it,” Servilia says. “Put it at the front.”

“At the front of everything this year,” Cornelia says. “It is becoming the family shelf.”

“It is becoming a generation. Do not let it go to your head before the wedding guests arrive.”

Cornelia sings one phrase again while putting away the music, carelessly, as if nobody were officially listening. Without the lesson around it, the unlicensed turn sounds less like defiance and more like a person taking the shortest honest route through a line. It reaches the corridor where Lentulus is passing with committee papers. He stops—not enough to be entered, enough for Onesimus, two paces behind, to catalogue the pause among the house’s new weather.

■

At home Cornelia does a thing she has never done: she asks her father a question in the atrium, at clients' hour, in public — where public means slaves and ancestors, the two audiences a Roman girl is raised to ignore and therefore the only two she entirely trusts.

The clients this morning have been, even by the standard of clients' hours, a curriculum. First a Cornelian freedman with a warehouse boundary and a new-surveyed grievance against the Avidii, already softened, he reports, by the prospect of being resolved at dinner. Then a veteran of the Moesia winter with one hand doing the work of the other and a land petition the household has carried, in the order of patience, to the top of the morning where it belongs. Then — last, because Lentulus scheduled her last without ever having decided to, the way scholiasts preserve the true reading in a margin — the freedwoman with the petition in Greek and Latin whose savings a dead man's son is keeping as household property. Her charcoal cross is on the family's side table. The Basilica has heard her, because Lentulus kept a street promise in the Forum of Caesar, and she has come to the house not for more help but with the advocate's receipt, which she presents standing, the way women present children for naming: restored, with costs.

Lentulus takes it standing, as his father taught him to receive clients. It is not a large sum. It is the size of sum his dinner clothes cost to clean for a season. In the freedwoman's books, which a clerk in the family's real epic is presently writing up in a hand suddenly taking more care, it is a shop.

“You kept your own copy,” Lentulus says. It is as close as this atrium comes to a compliment.

“A woman told me to, dominus, at the Basilica. Keep your own copy of everything. She sings there sometimes, for the lawyers, in the dinners after. A Greek person. She said paper's a freedman who never forgets his place, only you have to file him yourself.” She bows over the receipt with the air of a person who has concluded a small, complete campaign. “The house is thanked.”

Cornelia, who is not supposed to be in the atrium at clients' hour, who is crossing it on her mother's errand with her music held like a rescued thing, hears keep your own copy of everything in a singer's reported voice. It arrives in her the way the note arrived in the litter: soundlessly, and then everywhere. She looks at the masks. She looks at the side table where, for three hundred years, other people's copies have been kept by the Cornelii as a public service, at the household's rates.

She looks at her father, receiving a freedwoman's thanks for a clause he hasn't drafted yet, in an accent he doesn't know he is wearing because a woman on the Caelian dictated the first line of it to him in a banker's back room — none of which Cornelia knows, and all of which, the way people know weather from roofs they live under, she does.

That is why, when the atrium has thinned to its permanent population of slaves and ancestors, she does not go on to her lesson. The music can be warmed, trimmed, not lit. The question has been travelling from lower down, the way the Greek songs sit, and it has arrived in the room where her family answers questions professionally, or declines to answer them in excellent Latin at length for three hundred years. Her hands are steady on the roll. That is new this month too. Let the new things all arrive in one quarter; her house specialises in settlements that fall due together.

“Father. If the committee is about houses where men tell the truth after dinner, why does no woman sit on it? We are, I think, the dinners' main consequence.”

Lentulus, who has faced down embassies, experiences the specific vertigo of a man whose child has used his own forms against him correctly. “Committees,” he says, “are composed of senators.”

“Yes. I sat through the tutor too.” She is holding her music, not crushing it this time; her hands have learned something this month. “Marcus says the woman on the Caelian keeps Rome's real minutes. He says it to be troublesome, but he isn't clever enough to invent it, which in Marcus amounts to evidence.”

“You will not repeat your brother's bath-house evidence at the Acilii.”

“I will not repeat anything at the Acilii. I will sing one song, not the Greek, and be a wall.” She looks up at the masks, all those smoke-dark uncles of wax. “Did any of them ever ask their daughters a question, Father? Or is that the Greek song too — the one we keep for people who'd know?”

He should rebuke her. The rebuke is written; his family has been issuing it in fair copy for three hundred years. What he hears himself say, in the atrium, at clients' hour, in front of slaves and ancestors, is: “What would you ask the committee, if you sat on it?”

Cornelia's face does the thing faces do in this family at moments of unminuted honesty: nothing, thoroughly. Only her voice admits the earthquake. “I would ask it why a house where women are paid is a scandal for inspection, and a house where a daughter is dowered to pay a banker is a temple of the ancestors. I would ask it to define registered.”

“It would not answer.”

The word stays in the atrium after it has been said, the way a coin stays on a counter after the hand has gone: registered. Lentulus hears it in his clerk's voice, in Servilia's letter-voice, in a woman's voice in a cedar-smelling room laying a hand flat on a table so that nothing underdone would be sent out of her kitchen into law. He hears his father's version of it too, upside down on a dealer's tablet — with her increase, which is also a registration, of a kind. All his life the empire has been a matter of whose name is in which book in which hand, and his daughter, who is to be filed by vintage under Avidii, connexion of, subheading ballast, has just asked the only question the books were built to keep her from asking in this room: who does the registering, and at whose rates, and may the registered see the copy.

The clients are gone but the hour is not. Clients' hour in this house has a long tail, like a procession: boys with the morning's petitions being sorted for the day-book, the Arpinum cousins' gratitude being kept warm in a side room against a future in harbour dues, a slave damping the brazier even though the morning is bright because Servilia's standing orders do not argue with the weather, they anticipate it. Into this machinery Cornelia has put a question with no column. Lentulus watches his own household decide, in half a dozen pairs of averted eyes, to have been attending to the brazier, the petitions, the cousins' immortal gratitude, at the exact moment the master's daughter put the committee on trial and the master, instead of rebuking her in fair copy, invited her to draft the indictment.

It will be reported. Everything in an atrium is reported; it is what atria are for, the way dining rooms are for truths after fish. By the baths' second shift it will have become a story about a senator's daughter demanding a seat, which is not what happened. By dinner it will be evidence, in Marcus's phrase, which is worse than the truth and travels better. By next week, in a house on the Caelian where the real minutes are allegedly kept, a singer may slow a street song down about a girl asking her father to define a word, and a room full of men who register women professionally will laugh in the wrong place and then stop. Lentulus cannot draft for all that weather. His committee reports in ten days, now nine, and somewhere in its general, eventual dullness there is a clause taking shape like a stair inside a column drum: no house to profit, refusal, legal existence. It was dictated to him by its principal casualty and subpoenaed by his daughter in his own hall. A Cornelius pays his debts. His are arriving in female voices, in two registers, and neither of them is the Greek one, and both of them, his grandfather's ear tells him down the atrium's wet acoustics, have travelled.

"Go to your lesson," he says at last, and it is not a rebuke and it is not a dismissal either; the family has no form for it, which is how he knows it might, at his age, be a beginning. "One song first. For the house. The one about the keeping."

Cornelia looks at him across the ancestral smoke and the day-book's fresh ink. "The Roman one."

"The one," her father says, "you'd sing for people who'd know."

"No," Cornelia says. "I sit through dinners. I know the sound of the Senate not answering. It is my dowry, in a way. We all bring something." She bows, correctly, and goes to her lesson, and the lyre begins, and is corrected, and begins again — and Lentulus stands among the masks with his daughter's question filed in no book his Greek keeps, and thinks of another girl, at seventeen, with a stylus behind her ear, correcting the scansion on a line about a woman at a loom, and how the Cornelii have been trying to strike that one useful word — unpaid — from the record ever since, at compound interest.

Chapter Fourteen

The Committee Reports

. . .

The Senate in the morning is a theatre that has agreed to call itself a constitution. Sun through high windows, the benches filling in order of a precedence everyone affects not to calculate, the emperor's letter read by a secretary with the flat delivery of a man who knows the words will outlive everyone in the room except the building. Lentulus sits where a former consul sits, in the sightlines of power, and listens to a debate about harbour dues with the portion of his mind the Avidii have under option, and with the rest composes, for the last time, the speech he is no longer going to give.

He wrote the clause at dawn, with Felix waiting and the razor cooling in its water, because the day's official beginning had not yet made his hand anyone else's. That is how the household will remember it afterwards: not as legislation, but as an interruption in shaving. The committee's draftsman had sent up, the evening before, a fair copy in the washed Latin his father issued to a generation of Cornelian paperwork: order, decency, precedent, twenty-three categories of establishment arranged like furniture in a room nobody proposed to enter. Lentulus read it after dinner, commended its general dullness to Servilia, who was re-roping a household in another register entirely, and put it under the bust in his study like a man filing a letter he intends to be found by.

At dawn he sent for it again. His secretary, arriving with his face still arranged for sleep, found the master of the house standing at the window in the hour when clients are a rumour and ancestors are at their least upholstered, saying: “Read me the penalties.”

The penalties were read. They were good penalties, Roman penalties: fines scaled to visibility, closure for recidivists, a paragraph on unregistered persons that treated the persons themselves as the irregularity, the way his family's paperwork has always treated girls who arrived in households in other people's columns. Lentulus listened with his whole back.

“Strike that sentence,” he said.

“Which, dominus?”

“The one in which the person is the offence. Write instead—” He dictated it slowly, because a sentence that has been dictated to a man in a banker's back room by the woman it was designed to inspect deserves to go down at the speed it occurred. No house to profit by a person whose refusal has no legal existence. The secretary's stylus paused, a toll-gate, at refusal. Felix, who has no Latin he will admit to in that room, set the razor down like a man making way for furniture. “Again,” Lentulus said, and dictated it again, and then a third time, tightening the middle of it the way a man tightens a strap he expects to be hauled on in courts he will not live to attend.

The secretary, who has written harbour dues in upholstery and resignations in poetry, said at last, “The committee, dominus, did not minute this clause.”

“The committee will discover it has always intended it. Committees are how my family thinks. It is time one of them thought in public.”

Servilia, informed over the morning offering — told as an aside, at oyster-depth, which in this marriage is the register of state papers — poured, spoke the words, and set the cup exactly in the ring its predecessors had left on the household shrine. Only when the slaves had withdrawn did she say: “You will lose Syria on a subordinate clause.”

“I was losing Syria on the main clause, apparently. At least let the epitaph decline correctly.”

She straightened a fold of his dress with hands expert and, this morning, undisguised. “Then see it is read clearly. If Rome is to misquote you for a generation, Lentulus, don't let it be the clerk's fault.”

That is the family he carries into the Curia: a sentence shaved around at dawn, a wife who schedules everybody's acts including her own support, a daughter in the music room inserting unlicensed turns into old songs, a son out being invisible at considerable expense, and behind them all, in a cupboard under a cleaned mask, a dead man's instructions to choose better, which Lentulus is presently obeying in the only dialect his class will accept as tender of payment: he is about to be dull in the Senate, generally, eventually, and at ruinous personal cost, and in the middle of the dullness, like a stair inside a drum of stone, put one sentence where the future will have to climb through it to get to the view.

He had drafted it the way his family drafts everything: thoroughly, in periods that could support an aqueduct. That the city which taxes a trade owes that trade its regulations; that young men of family are mortgaging their grandfathers to freedmen's bankers; that what the aediles cannot find, the Senate has declined to see. It is a good speech. It would have been quoted in baths. It names no house and aims at one, which is rhetoric's oldest laundry service.

What he gives, when called, is the report. It is four minutes long. A general registry, quarterly fees, inspections at stated hours by appointment of the aediles, twenty-three categories of establishment, penalties for unregistered minors and unfree persons held without manumission papers — a clause he inserted at dawn in his own hand, with Felix the barber waiting, in language tighter than anything the committee's draftsmen produced: no house to profit by a person whose no has no legal existence. He hears Acilius shift on the bench at the clause, hears the room decide it is a fine sentiment and will be no trouble, hears, under the shuffle of assent, the small, specific silence of men recalculating which of their private arrangements the clause has just described in public Latin.

Debate follows because debate is what the theatre does after it has decided. An ex-consul of ninety, carried in by grandsons with faces like junior partners, rises to commend the report in a speech about the Rome of his youth, in which, to judge by the oration, nobody under sixty had ever wanted anything. He sits to applause, having demonstrated once again that longevity, in the Senate, is a form of evidence. A young wit of the new style, whose family made its money in bolt-cloth and its name in one consulship, wonders whether registries of houses might not benefit from public posting, like tax lists — a joke with a client inside it, since half the chamber has eaten the posting — and is applauded for the nerve and then, very smoothly, ignored for the substance. The Senate is skilled at this two-stroke reception. It has used it on invading armies, with mixed results.

Acilius speaks third, which in his arithmetic is where outcomes are parked. He supports the report as a model of general administration — the word lands exactly where Lentulus put it, between the quarters, and the men who understand the filing smile into their beards and documents. He praises the penalty structure. He passes over the clause at a height of perhaps four feet, as a man steps over a stair in the dark he has himself placed there, neither tripping nor calling attention to its useful location. On the bench beside Lentulus, Postumus murmurs, “He's walking it back to the fish,” in a voice so low it can only be heard by history and Onesimus, who is not present but will forget it by evening anyway as a matter of professional solidarity.

The only trouble arrives, as trouble in constitutions does, from a man who believes the paperwork is the point. He is a praetor with a future in provincial audits and a voice built for reading lists, and he wants the committee to define establishment for the twenty-fourth time in case houses should, through wit or cookery, migrate between categories overnight. Lentulus rises to him with the patience of a man who has decided to become an aqueduct in public: water arriving, anonymously, where the maps claimed. The definition is given. It is accepted. The praetor, defused by being minuted, sits with the satisfaction of a man who has been given the middle-sized purse at a patron's morning — encouragement, not danger — and the chamber shuffles itself toward the vote the way crowds shuffle toward an emperor: in a lane that opens before the reason is visible.

It passes the way his wife said it would when it finally became uninteresting enough to govern: without division, because a division would have required several hundred men to register, by name, how they felt about registering houses where women are paid to hear them tell the truth after dinner. The clerk reads the text into the record in the flat delivery of a man who knows the words will outlive the room. At the clause, his voice does not change. That is the whole art of it. No house to profit by a person whose refusal has no legal existence. It goes into the record like a stair goes into a column drum: set in stone, invisible from the ground, load-bearing for anyone who ever climbs.

Lentulus does not look at Acilius. Acilius does not look at the clerk. Postumus looks at his hands, where an old ring of his grandfather's has been telling him the weather for forty years. Somewhere in the benches, a senator whose private arrangements have just been described in public Latin begins, with great statesmanship, to revise them in his head: a girl in a lodging near the Carinae whose manumission money his steward is holding against breakages; a music master whose contract would not survive being read aloud by anybody's daughter. Multiply him by the chamber, subtract the men whose arrangements are already clean and the men too old for arrangement, and you have the exact size of the silence under the shuffle of assent: not repentance, nothing so expensive. Administration, arriving at last in the rooms Rome had kept locked and called honest.

The emperor's secretary makes no note that anyone can see. That, too, is entered everywhere that matters by noon.

Postumus, afterwards, in the portico: “That was either statesmanship or surrender. Your family does both in the same accent. Which is the Senate to put in the minutes?”

“The registry will pass.”

“The registry would have passed in December, before you sent a man to measure one woman's doorways at dawn. Now it passes over you, old friend. Syria—” Postumus, who loves him, and has that licence, does the un-Roman thing: he lowers his voice for a truth instead of raising it for a crowd. “Acilius tells me the secretaries have begun to say Hadrian's people for the east. Athens has been writing letters. Your name is — spoken, Lentulus. In baths. As steam."

Lentulus watches the Forum performing its noon: the changers, the litigants, the column stone baking in its yard. "I piloted a morals registry through the Senate and put the freedom of the women in it in words they cannot unwrite without reading them aloud. If Syria is the price, Syria was always going to be paid by someone in some currency. My father—" He stops, surprised by the route. "My father would call that a provincial sentiment."

"Your father," Postumus says, with feeling, "has been dead nine years and still schedules the household. Come to dinner. My wife has a singer who does Greek, and she sings it for people who know, which tonight, I fear, means us."

Avidius is waiting in the portico, which is not a thing fathers of prospective sons-in-law are supposed to do outside the Curia, and is therefore the thing Avidius does supremely well: hugely, patiently, in a cloak that costs less than his son's opinions and will outlast them. He has come, officially, about the harbour dues, which were debated before Lentulus's report in the same padded Latin; unofficially, he has come the way cargo comes, to inspect the receiving arrangements.

"Your clause," he says, without preamble, because preamble is for men who schedule.

"It was the committee's."

"Harbours are committees too, senator. The clauses that govern them are the ones nobody reads at the wedding feast." He looks out over the noon Forum, where his world is going up and down in bales under other men's marble. "I employ freedwomen in the counting houses at Ostia. Three of them can read a manifest better than my second son-in-law can read a will. One of them asked me last year — me, Avidius, who came up by the dock ropes — whether her savings in the company's chest were hers in law or only in her name. I told her to ask the lawyers. She told me the lawyers were what she was saving against." He produces, from this parable, the harbourman's shrug that has ratified most of the century's sensible arrangements. "Your sentence will travel, Lentulus.

Cargo does."

"It is a registry clause about lodging houses."

"So was grain, once. A registry clause about breakfast." Avidius inclines his great head the smallest degree a rich man can manage without spraining anything. "Tell Servilia the fleet money is comforted. My boy still listens with his face. The figures, when your brother-in-law is ready to stop calling them a climate, are ready to be weather."

He goes down the steps like a ship leaving a festival: slowly, correctly, with everyone's calculations quietly re-ballasted around him. Postumus watches him go.

"There," Postumus says. "That is the vote that mattered, and it wasn't in the chamber. Your daughter will be married out of a sentence about brothels, old friend. Rome will call it an alliance. I intend to be insufferable about it at the feast."

"You intend to be insufferable about everything at the feast. It's your family's one export."

They walk, because a senator who has just lost a province in the baths' version and gained a son-in-law in the portico's needs to arrive at his own house at human speed, the way people do who are carrying news home in their own hands for a change. The Forum performs its noon around them: changers changing, litigants litigating for practice, the column stone in its yard taking the sun like a beached argument. A boy trots beside them for a whole block selling the day's posted lists — taxes, notices, the text of the registry already being copied by a scribe who will charge a freedwoman half for the clause alone, though nobody in the street knows it yet, least of all the freedwoman, who at present is in a lodging house near the Carinae having her manumission money held against breakages by a man who considers the phrase a form of care.

At the Palatine house, Servilia hears the result the way she hears everything — at the speed other people decide whether to repeat it — which is to say she has already converted it, by the time Lentulus reaches the atrium, into three actions: a letter, a dinner, and a change in the standing instructions about Marcus. The letter to her brother has gone from draft to sealed in the interval. The dinner is Thursday. Marcus is discovered, in the garden, being invisible in full view of the household, with his accounts and his philosophy.

“The committee has reported,” Lentulus tells his wife.

“I know. Acilia's steward's wife dyes my wool.” She hands him the household's version of the text, copied fair by the family clerk, in which the clause sits in its paragraph like a newel post. “Read it,” she says, and it is not a request any more than ministries make them.

He reads it. It reads, on his own paper, in his clerk's hand, like a letter from somebody else's better self, which, in the banking sense, it is. “It will be quoted against me in Athens,” he says. “By secretaries.”

“Then Athens will finally be quoting you for something you wrote after you were twenty-four.” Servilia takes the copy back and puts it where the family's real epic lives, in the chest with the day-book and the Arpinum gratitude and the formulae for refusing people in excellent Latin. “Dinner on Thursday, husband. Plotina's freedwoman. Bring the clause, by all means. Leave Syria at home in its locked room; we are feeding other pets now.”

Somewhere in the house Cornelia is at her lesson. The lyre is corrected, note by note. Then it begins again, and this time nobody corrects it at all.

He goes to Postumus's dinner out of the same instinct that made him walk home at noon: a need to arrive at the evening at human speed, among people who will tell him the baths' version before the fish. Postumus's wife keeps a table at which new money, old malice and extremely good music are seated in proportions Servilia describes, in her letters, as a harbour in a gale, and means as praise. The singer is a freedwoman from Antioch with a voice like a road going east, and she sings the Greek ones for people who'd know, and Postumus, meeting Lentulus's eye across a sauce his cook has clearly stolen from a better house and improved with money, raises his cup a fraction: I told you I feared this.

Acilius is there, being spontaneous in his rehearsed way among the second-course conversations. With him is a secretary of the emperor's household, short-sighted and vain about it, the same man Antonia once catalogued from the margin of a dedication crowd among contractors' wives, and he is retailing the day in the flat tones secretaries keep for matters that have been decided elsewhere. The registry: approved as dull; dullness being, at that altitude, a recommendation. The clause: noted. The word comes across the table with the boar and is caught, as words are at Postumus's dinners, by three conversations at once.

“Noted by whom?” asks a senator whose nephew died in the spring of very little that could be registered, and whose interest in houses is therefore presumed philosophical.

“By the people who note things, in Athens as in Rome,” says the secretary, without looking up from the operation of his knife. “Hadrian writes that an empire which cannot say what a refusal is will spend a great deal of money finding out province by province. He says it in Greek, which makes it sound less like an administrative warning.”

The table laughs in the way tables do when a future has just been served among the courses and everyone is deciding how much of it to eat in public. Lentulus, with the portion of his mind that is no longer under option to anyone, hears his dawn sentence arrive back at him translated, framed, and lightly garnished with Athens. Syria, he understands, is leaving the room by the same door the clause came in. It goes quietly. It has been, in his life, a sentence accepted too, in a way — a place his family's kind of man was for, the way marble is for columns — and he has never till tonight watched himself not grieve an inheritance in public and call the not-grieving statesmanship too. Perhaps, his father's kitchen voice says out of nine years of brine, choosing better is also a province, but you govern it from inside the house.

Postumus's singer begins again for the last set — Greek, lower, travelled. A young man at the low end of the table, some connection's son being shown the capital like a prospectus, asks loudly whether songs like that were the sort the committee meant to register, and the room does the thing rooms have been doing all year in Lentulus's hearing: it laughs, and stops, and looks, not at the singer, but at him.

“No,” Lentulus says, into the small, specific silence. “The committee registered the houses. The songs were always going to be above our competence.”

It gets the laugh back, with interest, and Acilius inclines his head by the half degree a consul can manage without spraining the future. The secretary does not write it down. It will be in Athens by the new moon anyway, improved, like everything else the plumbing carries uphill: a Cornelius with a freedwoman's conscience, who has stopped applying for the east and started drafting for it. Lentulus drinks to nobody in particular, and thinks of a sealed tablet being smoothed by a dead man's hand, and of a girl across two rivers of paperwork holding her own copy this time, and lets the Greek song travel, lower down, all the way to where the keeping happens.

The language of a report is a public room with all its furniture turned to the wall. Postumus prefers it that way. He reads the draft aloud in Lentulus’s study, giving every cautious phrase the dignity of a man reading his own future inscription and finding the lettering tasteful.

“‘Prejudicial to established custom,’” he says. “That is good.”

“It is not good,” Lentulus says. “It is roomy.”

“In reports, roominess is a virtue.”

“In houses, it is called a corridor.”

A Secretary at the side table is making three copies because the original may have to survive being understood by men with appointments. Diomedes is not present—Diomedes is never present in rooms where the Senate writes about people who pay his house’s fees—but his habits have colonised Lentulus’s vocabulary to an extent the senator is only beginning to invoice. Every clause now asks, at the back of Lentulus’s mind, where the copy is kept and whose hand is allowed to be honest.

Postumus objects to a sentence about “conditions of service” on the grounds that it implies conditions might differ.

“They do differ,” Lentulus says.

“Not in the report’s preferred universe.”

“Then let the report apply for citizenship in ours.”

The Secretary pauses with his pen in the air, a young man learning that history sometimes turns up as an argument over adjectives before lunch. Postumus sighs with the profundity of a Roman whose principles have encountered paperwork. “You have become troublesome in a minor key.”

“I am told it improves audibility.”

“By whom, the water board?”

“By women with copies.”

That, finally, is too much even for a room arranged to prevent meaning. Postumus looks up. Lentulus looks level. The sentence has entered the study in the wrong hand, so to speak, and can no longer be removed without smudging. The Secretary does not write it. It goes instead into the air of the committee, where many true sentences spend a season before anyone invents a heading that can survive them.

When the draft is done, Lentulus keeps no special copy. That is new. The Greek will have one eventually; the house on the Caelian will have one sooner; the Senate will deny needing one. Rome, as always, is being governed by distribution.

■

The news reaches the Caelian, as all news does, in three strengths: the door-book version by noon, the baths version by dinner, and Diomedes's version, which is the facts with their shoes on, by the time the evening guests are at the fish. Antonia hears them all. Her house is to be registered quarterly, like the tax, like the licence, like the weather. The clause — Diomedes reads it from the posted text with the neutrality he uses for death notices — about persons whose refusal must have legal existence, she hears standing still in her own kitchen with a tasting spoon struck dumb in her hand.

The first version arrives before noon on a human back, as most of the house's essentials do. It is carried by a wine carter who once tried to smuggle Campanian past Barbatus in the dark and now overpays his debt to the house in news, delivered at the yard door with the amphorae: the committee's done; it's general; you're all to be registered and nobody's to be closed before you've been apologised to by appointment. He is tipped in soup. In the door-book, Diomedes enters him under intelligence, vintage of, with a note to adjust his cartage at the next quarter in recognition of services to the cellar's morale.

The second version arrives with the afternoon's first caller, a grain man from Puteoli who cancelled three bookings in the inspection weather and now wishes, with a merchant's memory for tides, to uncancel all three and add a fourth as ballast. “A house that's survived the Senate,” he says, settling into Antonia's presence like cargo into a hold, “is a house a man can do business in without his wife's brother writing letters. No offence to the committee.”

“None taken on its behalf. I file offences quarterly, and the committee has had its quarter.” She moves him from apology to menu in two sentences, because apology unconverted is a cost a house carries twice. Behind her, Diomedes enters the rebookings in the second hand, the one for facts that must survive fashion, and the house feels, along its corridors, the small arterial change of a calendar filling up.

The third version — the facts with their shoes on — Diomedes fetches himself from the posting place, having sent nobody who might improve it in transit. He has the text copied entire. This costs money. Money, in this house, is spent on paper the way other houses spend it on priests: early, regularly, and in the belief that disasters prefer unregistered premises. He lays the copy out on the kitchen's least floury table, because Antonia, who is tasting sauces against the return of the Alexandrians, conducting the foreign policy of the evening from beside a stove, will not leave the kitchen in the middle of a sauce for anything less than an emperor, a fire, or a clause.

“The registry is as madam was advised,” he says, reading as a man reads a bill he has already paid. “General. Quarterly. By appointment. Inspections at stated hours, by officials named in advance, in the public rooms.” He says public rooms in a way that costs Ammonius, at the great stove, an audible snort into the saffron. “Penalties for unregistered persons are struck out. In their place, a provision concerning house-keepers.” The stylus behind his ear stays where it is. In eleven years it has only once been taken down for emotion, and the kitchen was informed of it for a week. “Shall I read the provision, madam?”

“Read the provision, Diomedes.”

He reads it in his death-notice neutrality, standing in a kitchen in a house built out of stairs, and the women shelling peas for the Alexandrians stop shelling at refusal the way a room once stopped laughing between courses. Philomela, who is resting her voice upside down on a stool with her hair in a towel — a professional posture nobody feels entitled to question — sits up slowly, like an audience in one body. Daphne, who has been mending at the table's far end because in this house even the singers mend, puts the needle down carefully, so that history shall not later claim she dropped it.

“Again,” Antonia says, in the voice she uses for menus and mercy.

He reads it again.

Outside the kitchen window the courtyard performs its winter afternoon: the damp map of a country drying off the wall at last, Barbatus supervising a delivery of lamp oil with thumbs the size of small hammers, a girl with a basket walking the long way past the music room. Inside, nobody does anything with the sentence for a moment except keep it. Keeping, in this house's book and a fuller's across the river, is a complete action. Then Daphne says, “That is the sentence you gave him,” not as a question, because Daphne has the singer's disease and believes every room has a song under it, and today the song and the sentence have arrived in the same post.

“I gave nobody anything.” Antonia takes the tasting spoon back from wherever her hand has parked it in the air and returns it to the sauce, which has been waiting with a patience the Senate might study. “I described, in a banker's office, what a registry would have to contain if it was to be a registry and not a raid. A senator drafted. Men who draft should be encouraged with soup, Daphne, not attribution. Attribution is a tax.”

Philomela, upright now, with the towel slipping, says, “In Corinth we had a saying about generals who win battles other people planned: they get the processions, we get—”

“—the contracts,” Antonia says. “Yes. At the new year. Every woman in this house, with that provision cited in her own hand at the foot of her terms. Diomedes will prepare the copies. Yours, Philomela, may be in Greek, for people who'd know. Daphne's will be in a hand large enough for auditors.” She says it as housekeeping. The kitchen hears it as something else and files it as housekeeping anyway — that is how revolutions are entered in the first book, upright and dull, so that they may survive to be interesting in the second.

The pastry cook, who has strong views on saffron and none that he voices on politics, says, “Mistress?”

“More salt than that, in the sauce for the Alexandrians. They will be back now. Men come back when a house has survived the Senate; it is like a recommendation from a temple.” She gives him the spoon. “Diomedes. Read the clause again.”

He reads it again. Latin, exact, unlovely — the most beautiful letter she has ever not received.

That evening the house fills in its ordinary, extraordinary way, except that ordinariness — for three months a commodity under inspection — now commands a premium the day-book records under room hire, post-senatorial. The Alexandrians' agent sends to book the great room for the fleet signing, with Prima's hanging to be left up for the occasion, a compliment itemised in the message among the courses as if cloth were a sauce. Serapion himself is still at sea, but Heron dines in the small room with the tax farmers, celebrating a partnership at its third resurrection, in a house whose legal shape has this morning been re-drawn by a committee into something a Greek can bank against. The elderly advocate holds his court. The equestrian widow laughs twice, the second time without checking the door. Rome, having inspected the premises and found a kitchen, goes back to eating in it as if it had never stopped, which is the highest form of acquittal the city issues.

Eirene does the late round with Antonia, lamps going down front to back, the theatre unlit in reverse. At the linen room door she says, “Well. We are a registered scandal. It is entered. What does madam propose for an encore? I ask as junior partner in catastrophe; the position is otherwise underoccupied this month.”

“Prima,” Antonia says. It is the first time she has put the word at the head of a day's agenda rather than in its margins, under thread. “Tomorrow is Thursday. The hanging comes home from the Alexandrians. Her father is no worse, which across the river means he is worse at a statelier pace. The guild papers from the Greek should be ready by the new moon.” She stops at the office door, where Diomedes has set out, in a row, the evening's small dignities: the rebookings, the posted text, a bowl of olives with one missing because Eirene has celebrated the survival of the house in her own way, standing up. “I am not going to spend her on this, Eirene. Not on a clause, not on a committee, not on being right in a banker's window room. The telling comes when it comes, in the order of the evening, with the fish a long way behind us.”

“And the senator?”

“The senator has had his clause read into the record by a clerk with no inflection. It is the closest his family gets to a love letter, and he arranged it himself, at dawn, unshaven, in his own hand. Let Athens quote him.” She looks at the posted text, flat under Diomedes' paperweight — a worn bronze of a river god with an expression of a man who has read the small print since Romulus. “Tomorrow, send to Transtiberim that the house will want the spring work again. By the piece. Thread separate. And Eirene—”

“Love.”

“The next time I say I am not counting catastrophes yet either, charge me the widow's rate for self-deception. We are on the third by any book that matters, and it is not yet the vintage.”

“File it,” she says, “with the tax receipts.”

“Which quarter?”

“Between the quarters. With the rest of his correspondence.”

Chapter Fifteen

Saturnalia Postponed

. . .

Winter lays its flat hand on the city: smoke, short light, the poor burning what the rich have renovated out of. Vibius the fuller declines in the manner of his trade, which is to say by water. The cough brings up the vats' whole history; the guild sends a physician who speaks kindly to Prima and uselessly to the disease; the baker's mother sends soup with inspections in it and finds, to her own surprise, that she is staying to administer both. She is a hard woman, but hardness in Transtiberim is just tenderness that has been charged by the hour for forty years, and Prima, watching her future mother-in-law wipe her father's chin with a cloth she herself has hemmed, revises a ledger she did not know she was keeping.

In Transtiberim the approach of Saturnalia is measured differently from the Palatine, where the festival arrives by invitation. Across the river it arrives by eaves: by the smell of other people's roasting drifting over the vats at the dinner hour, by the price of the little clay figures going up in inverse proportion to their quality, by masters in the fuller’s guild debating, as they debate every year with the enthusiasm of men discovering generosity as a climate, whether the holiday dole shall be in oil, in coin, or in the form of a speech. Prima's household measures it by her father's breathing at the fourth hour, when the yard gets its one bar of sun and the garments go up on the frames like a population being aired after a siege.

The cough has learned the house. That is how Prima thinks of it in the hours when thinking is a luxury after water and honey: it knows the step up to the vat-room that costs him, it knows the advantage of taking him halfway through a sentence so that other people finish it wrong, it knows the nights. His own account is different and delivered, on good mornings, like a trade report: “Chest's full of river this week. Trade will have its customs. We pay on the day.” Then he wants the bench by the frames, where he can supervise. A man who has held a household up for thirty years by being the still point of its washing does not retire to a bed without the household conspiring in his fiction. The guild boys bring him the dry garments to inspect. He inspects them with his thumbs, the customs officer's bequest to the whole bank of the river, and pronounces on rinses at a distance like a rich man on morals.

The guild physician is Nikias' poor relation by profession rather than blood: a younger Greek with a travelling case and a manner he is still learning to spend appropriately in rooms where money is soup-thin. He speaks kindly to Prima because Prima asks the questions in an order that allows him to answer them, and uselessly to the disease because the disease has never in its history attended a consultation. He prescribes the honey, thyme in the steam, rest — that palace word, issued to the poor like a lottery ticket — and, at the door, with the air of a man telling the truth in its overcoat, he says to her, “Keep him warm past the festival, fuller’s daughter. Winter is the tax. Spring sometimes remits.”

She pays him out of the Caelian money for the spring hangings, itemised recently to a fare-thee-well, and he takes it with an embarrassment that tells her the guild has already mentioned his fee in full. She says nothing. In this neighbourhood, where Antonia Cassia's kindness arrives by a plumbing of entitlements and suppliers, saying nothing is also a talent being purchased somewhere upstream. She has begun — third treacherous comparison, unfiled — to recognise good plumbing when it doesn't splash.

Mother Livia's soup comes on Mondays and, increasingly, on other days that have had to be renamed Mondays for the purpose. She brings it herself because (a) Titus at the ovens is careless with liquids and (b), never to be minuted at the guild women’s rota, because she has discovered in Vibius's sickroom a quality her own male household, with its flour and its second columns, does not supply: an audience that cannot get up. She tells him the neighbourhood. She tells it thoroughly, with names, because names in Transtiberim are news and news, dosed correctly, is medicine that doesn't taste of honey. She tells him which of the tanners' widows has taken a young husband and what the guild thinks of the wool trade, and what the priest at the island temple charged a bargee for a vow, and Vibius receives it all with his eyes half shut like a senator at a debate he has already decided, and says, at intervals that prove he has been following the items like an auditor: “That one's lying.” “That one pays.” “That one'll be filed by spring.”

It is doing something to Prima's accounts of the woman, this discovery of her future mother-in-law in a posture the contracts never itemised: on her knees at a sick man's fire, skimming soup with one hand and conducting the street with the other. Between them, over Vibius's bowl, the two women have arrived at the form of government their men call, in cleaner rooms, an understanding. The dowry has not been mentioned in a fortnight. The reading has been promoted, in Mother Livia's reported speech at the bakehouse, from defect to “that business with the second columns; a girl who finds money in columns can find weevils in flour.” Weevils, Prima understands, are the producing class’s poetry.

Saturnalia arrives round them all the same, without asking the house's permission. It inverts the world at the proper addresses: in Transtiberim it mostly clarifies it. Masters serve their slaves a meal and expect, by January, compound gratitude. The guild gives its dole in oil, the speech having been voted, mercifully, into a cask. Titus bakes the festival loaves with his sleeves at the senatorial stripe and brings Prima one shaped, by a baker's grandson learning the trade on her betrothal, like a flower with too many petals, which Vibius inspects with his thumbs and pronounces “a fair attempt at your border, girl, in bread. Let no one register it.” For half an hour the sickroom is a room with laughing in it, and the cough — that tenant who has learned the house — sits politely in the corner all tenants reserve for the family furniture, and Prima keeps the laughter's accounts exactly, the way her mother kept stairs: not because she thinks a count will change the sum, but so the sum will not change her.

Antonia hears of the decline from Eirene, who hears of it from Barbatus, who has started walking Prima to the crossing on his own time and bringing back, with the emptied lantern, the news of the street the way other men bring back winnings. Antonia does the things that do not constitute interference in the filings of her conscience: the guild pension enquiries discover a forgotten entitlement; honey of a quality that needs no discussion arrives from a supplier; the physician's second visit is paid before the first has been billed. She stops there. She has built a life out of knowing where a kindness becomes a claim, and she will not begin her motherhood — the word arrives and is set down carefully, like a full glass carried across her own courtyard — as a purchase.

His reports become a feature of the Caelian mornings, filed between the carter's weather and Diomedes' first book. “Fuller was sitting by the frames.” “Fuller asked after the price of wool, mistress, and called the guild physician a Greek theatre.” “Fuller's not beaten, but the house is heating honey at hours that suggest the night staff ain't sleeping.” Barbatus delivers them standing, out of a habit older than his door, and Antonia receives them standing too, whatever room it is, a discipline her household begins, without being told, to imitate at the edges: Eirene stops arranging; Diomedes stops writing. Eleven years of staff know when information has a face.

The things that do not constitute interference are arranged with a care that would shame a foreign ministry. Diomedes, instructed to proceed as if buying thread, discovers through the guild chest that Vibius's dues purchase a physician's second visit where decline is chronic and the householder of good standing, a clause sleeping in the guild's papers since a consulship nobody at the vats can name. It is woken up. It is minuted. No name of the waker appears. Honey arrives at a fuller's house in winter from a supplier whose cousin works Antonia's kitchens; this is Rome; cousins are a currency. A warmer for the sickroom is conveyed by the guild's common stock because the common stock discovers, in the frost, a surplus. Antonia governs the whole campaign the way she governs a banquet for Alexandrians: from the seating. Nothing is placed where its donor would have to be looked at.

“You could simply give them money,” Eirene says, once, trimming the lamps down in the small hours when the house's Saturnalia has done its worst and best. The great room has hosted the festival in its professional form: masters pretending to serve, slaves permitted to be witty within quotations, everybody paying Antonia for an evening of inversion staged so competently that no hierarchy was actually harmed in the performance. A senator's freedman won at dice. A senator lost with the grace of a man whose grandfather is on a mask across the city saying the same. Daphne sang, for the set that is hers now by custom and contract, the slow street song at full speed, as a holiday, and made the room laugh in all the right places like a fortune returning.

“I could give them money. I could walk across the bridge with it in a bag marked Caelian. The neighbourhood would have the story by the watch-change: the mistress buys the fuller's daughter for a mushroom. By January it's a scandal. By the hanging's border it's her reputation unhemmed and his pride the poorer. No.” Antonia watches a servant — allowed at Saturnalia to answer back, doing it with the restraint of a man who has read his contract's new clause in his own hand at New Year and is rich now in a way the festival cannot lend him — refuse a guest's third undiluted cup with a bow. “Kindness has to travel like their other news, Eirene: through the guild, through cousins, through the plumbing. If it arrives with my name on it, it arrives as a claim. I know about claims. I have a committee's worth of education in claims, and I paid fees.”

Eirene trims. “And the clause you wrote somewhere yourself — between the quarters — the one about debts in deathwatches?”

“That one is family law. We don't minute it.” But she is looking, as she says it, at the box in Diomedes' office, where, between tax receipts, are now filed: an unsigned note that taught her a phrase; a posted text with a law in it; a December bill marked settled in copy; and nothing at all, in any hand, from across the river, because the fourth set of books is being kept where it has always been kept, and some mornings at thirty-eight, after a Saturnalia at full price, holding it feels like carrying a full glass very slowly across a courtyard she owns, among roses, in the sight of gods whose inspectors make their rounds by appointment. The word arrives. She sets it down. It does not spill. That is both the achievement and its whole cost, and Diomedes, entering with the day-book, tactfully prices something else.

She goes herself, once. Not as the mistress of the Caelian consulting a tradeswoman; veiled, in a cloak Eirene calls her widow-inventing cloak, with Barbatus at a distance that suggests he is escorting someone else entirely. The fuller's house is two rooms and a lean-to over the vats' yard, and it is ordered with the ferocious neatness of people who know disorder is the first luxury they will be blamed for. Vibius is propped against the wall-bed, grey as undyed wool, and he looks at Antonia for a long moment with eyes that the trade has made professionally sceptical about the true colour of anything.

“The thread lady,” he says.

“The house on the Caelian,” Prima says, flustered, “has come about the hangings for spring, Father. I told her you were to rest.”

“I am resting. It's my busy season.” Vibius's breath goes in like something being wrung. “Sit, mistress, if a stool is not beneath you. Prima, put water on. The mistress drinks—” he looks at Antonia again “—watered wine and not much of it. Working women.” A pause, which the cough fills in its own handwriting. “My wife worked in Baiae.”

“Prima told me. Stairs.”

“Ninety. She counted everything so it wouldn't count her.” The old man is holding the edge of his blanket the way men hold a rail in weather. “She kept what she was given to keep, my wife. Garments. Money. People.” His eyes do not leave Antonia's face. “We were decent people in the way that matters, I hope. We continued after the paying stopped being the reason. Twelve years after. A long soak, mistress. Most things come clean if you don't rush it.”

“Ninety was the grand house, on the point,” Vibius says, correcting a legend with a sick man's priorities. “There was a smaller, by the shore road, sixty-four and a turn where the water slopped if you counted wrong. Claudia did the shore house the last winter. She came up with the dealer's party in the spring and I saw her at the island market with a tally in her hand, counting a porter's load for him because he'd got his figures in the second column wrong." He intends this as a joke for the room, and it becomes, on its way to Prima, something she will keep in her work-box forever: her mother, newly in Rome, doing sums at a market stall; a fuller three weeks freed watching with a plan arriving in him like weather off a river. It is the first courtship scene her parents' marriage has ever been granted in her hearing, and it is being told to a veiled woman on a stool while the kettle wastes its breath at the hearth.

"I told this house you were to rest," Prima says, to the water, furiously.

"Rest is being reported. I'm filling in the between-times." Vibius's eyes go back to the visitor, who is holding herself like a person carrying something full across his room. "She could price a household by its linen, Claudia could. 'You can tell a house by what it sends out dirty,' she'd say. 'And a woman by what she's sent out with.' She had the sayings filed like a guild clerk, mistress. It's where the girl gets them. Not from me. I only kept things clean."

Antonia hears It's where the girl gets them arrive and settle in the second column. There is no expression available to a widow-inventing cloak for the information that the sayings have two mothers too, so she makes none. She sits on the offered stool, in the posture of a woman consulting a tradesman about spring hangings, while Prima performs at the hearth the rites of water already hot, and the room's whole archive — bench, wall-bed, tools on a bench, a hanging folded face inward over a chair, the festival loaf's successor under a cloth, a bowl of honey dressed with thyme like medicine making an effort — conducts its silent examination of her. She has been inspected by aediles, prefects, committees and one publisher of cohorts of younger men. A fuller's two rooms, ferociously neat, are the most thorough tribunal she has faced in Rome. It is also, she understands with a clarity that arrives without roadworks, the first room she has been in for twenty years that her younger self would have known how to work in straight off: heat the water, count the stairs, hold the mirror steady, be furniture until somebody's arithmetic promotes you.

“Your daughter's work is known across the river,” she says, because work is the passport she has brought and it is not false. “A contractor's wife tried to order the same border from a man at the Forum who copies. He brought me his copy to admire. The flowers were all the same.”

Vibius smiles into the blanket's edge he is holding like a rail. “That's how you know it's not hers. Prima's won't march in step if you pay them extra. Her mother taught her that out of the leaves — no, girl, the water's done, cease fire — she taught her that a made thing should keep the maker's weather in it somewhere. For the reading, later.” He coughs then, properly, the whole house rearranging itself around the sound — prima donna of this winter's programme — and Prima is there with the cup and the cloth, and Antonia is on her feet without having given the order, like staff, like (her body says before she can file it) family. She steadies the bowl. That is all. Bowl-steadying is not in any set of books. Her hands have been holding things steady for other people's houses since she was nine years old, and here is her hand, bare of rings for the Basilica and the sickroom alike, doing it in a fuller's lean-to for a man who knows exactly who she is and has decided, at the pace of water, not to file it anywhere the tax office reads.

Prima is at the hearth with her back turned, very busy with water that is already hot. Antonia understands that she is being given, by a dying fuller in a two-room house across the river, the exact respect of not being named. She repays it in kind: “The guild speaks well of this house. The spring hangings will want a firm hand. Your daughter's dowry, I am told, is to include her tools. My house will commission her trousseau work at her own prices. It is how we file respect, across the river. Quarterly.”

Vibius closes his eyes. A smile moves under the greyness like a fish in the Tiber, briefly visible, unquestionably there. “Then we're all filing the same thing, mistress. In different books."

On the walk back, Barbatus maintains his fiction of escorting nobody until they are at the bridge, where he says, to the river, in the voice men use for the fights they are remembering instead of the ones they won: "In the arena we had a word for a man who holds the rail and jokes. We called him not beaten yet. The fuller's not beaten."

"No," Antonia says. "He is being succeeded. It is different, and worse, and nobody makes songs about it. Which is why women write the accounts instead."

The river in winter dusk is doing its old work of carrying the city's lights away in pieces too small to invoice. On the island the temple lamps are being lit for a god who specialises, if Barbatus's theology is reliable, in the illnesses of people who have already been given up by more fashionable addresses. A barge goes down unlit. Ice is thinking about the banks and not committing itself, like a committee. Antonia walks beside the fiction of her escort with her veil still at the widow-inventing angle and thinks about water, because in her life everything she is not ready to think about directly files itself under water first.

She thinks about Baiae, which is to say she does not, professionally, for whole minutes at a time. The sea there has a different manners from a river: it gives things back altered and refuses to discuss the post. Rome's river keeps them. Twenty years ago a steward put a child into the current of other people's decency and charged the house for the mileage, and the current — unlike any Cornelius, unlike a certain dealer, unlike (she will be exact, in the second column, where it matters) herself, standing frozen with a basket on a landing learning how arrangements sound — the current carried the parcel home. Fullers. Dues paid in bad winters first. A guild book that writes arrivals where the Senate would write claims. It is not that the city is kind. The city is a market. But markets, at the unglamorous level where the plumbing runs and women file kindnesses as oil and thread, perform a kind of laundering that brings some things out cleaner than their owners intended.

“I could use a word,” Barbatus says to the river, resuming his career as a furniture of speech. “In the old house, in the Subura days of the mistress, there was a laundress told fortunes off wet cloth. She'd lay a sheet out smoking and read the steam. Rubbish, mostly, but she read people off their laundry better than any priest off an offal. Said the stains knew before the owners did.”

“And did she read me?”

“She read the house. She said the stairs would outlive it. We've kept the stairs at the Caelian house in excellent repair, mistress, but I take her meaning at this distance to've been methods.” He stops at the bridge's crown, where his escort duties officially evaporate, and looks back at Transtiberim going into its lamplight: vats settling, frames down, a physician's boy trotting with a case, somebody's daughter heating honey in a room two doors and one whole world away. “Fuller'll want his say in the naming of things before—” He evaluates the phrase and leaves it in the river. “Men do. Even them as files everything at the back. Something to look to, mistress, at the guild's usual hours.”

At home that night the Saturnalia debris has been converted, by staff who are no longer required to find it amusing, into the ordinary evening. A guest's luck-piece has been left on a couch, to be entered in the Guests' Property box and claimed at dusk in a panic of discretion. Ammonius is proposing, for the Alexandrians' return, a sauce that will require Antonia's second word again and receiving it with a dignity that suggests he has finally understood that again is this house's word for faith. She stands in the office doorway watching Diomedes enter the day in three hands and thinks: I have held a dying man's soup bowl steady with the hand that held the mirror at seventeen, in a house that sold the mirror's holder, and nobody in that room charged anybody for history. It is not forgiveness. She does not trade in forgiveness, whose market her childhood cornered and ruined. It is better and smaller and will keep like money. It is an unpaid thing, done in the right house at last.

She does not know yet in what hour of what night she will sit in a linen room with a daughter arrived and tell it in the order of the evening while a needle makes its small red row between them like a frontier being gardened. She knows the conditions. Conditions are her department: first the dying at the pace of water, then the mourning at its proper tariff, then — not a door held open by strangers, not a father drafting her life into two names, not the baths — a woman she already trusts with a needle, who is herself, which is the terrible and sufficient clause. Late, the family opens things late. She will open this one, unlike a certain will in a sticking cupboard, on time: a concept she intends, at thirty-eight, to teach the Cornelii at her usual rates, quarterly, with the thread itemised separately.

A postponed festival leaves supplies in search of a philosophy. Nuts have been ordered, small gifts wrapped, a musician paid a deposit by a man who now wishes to convert Saturnalia into a serious dinner with togas. Diomedes gives him a schedule for both and charges for the difference between joy and respectability, a transaction Eirene describes as “seasonal government”.

In the kitchen, Ammonius is insulted by postponement. A sauce, he maintains, cannot be told to be merry at a later date by an office. “It has a constituency,” he says, waving towards ingredients gathered like an electorate. “These leeks were promised an inversion of rank.”

“Give them soup,” Eirene says. “It is the usual revolution.”

Prima is at the linen table with work that has come in under the respectable heading of repair. She has heard of Saturnalia at the Caelian in the way one hears of weather on an island owned by rich relations: described too warmly to be believed before the windows are checked. “Do the clients really serve the staff?” she asks.

“Symbolically,” Diomedes says. “With supervision.”

“And then everyone goes back to their columns the next day.”

“Tradition requires recovery time.”

Antonia, passing with a basket of household gifts that have missed their feast, says: “At this house the staff are served first in the kitchen. It saves the guests a performance and gives the hierarchy something private to worry about."

Prima considers this over a seam. "At the guild we eat standing when there's a death. It is not so much rank upside down as everybody making room where the chair isn't."

The sentence travels no farther than the linen room. It is not the sort of thing to be carried across a house for applause. But later, when the festival food is redistributed under duller names—staff supper, stores, customers' samples—Eirene sees that a portion is set aside in clean cloth for the night workers and porters, the people who usually hold other people's merriment steady from the doors.

"Saturnalia postponed," Barbatus says, receiving his share at the street. "Empire's in."

"Eat before information," Eirene tells him. "It is a rule with holidays."

He does. The city beyond is turning rank upside down for the evening and putting it carefully back by morning. The house, richer in forms of in-betweenness, feeds first the people who know where the ladders are kept.

■

The days after develop their own winter offices. Prima comes to the Caelian on the Thursday, because the spring hangings are work and work, in her street, is how families inform the world that nobody has died yet. She brings the finished border for inspection — inspection now being a word with soup in it, per the house's arrangements — and Antonia, who has commissioned cloth from half the looms in Rome, receives it in the small room off the courtyard where the light is, with Eirene in attendance and Diomedes' stylus performing the liturgy of by-the-piece. Prima's face has the winter in it. It also has, at nineteen, the thing her mother bequeathed under Kept and her other circumstances bequeathed under nothing at all: the refusal to let a roomful of richer people tell her how to hold her own material.

“The count's off by three flowers at the return,” she says, before anyone can be kind at her. “I did them in again at my own prices. It's entered.”

“Show me the stitch that doesn't remember itself,” Antonia says, and it is out before the drill can stop it: not the phrase she audits other people's work with, but the one from a rainy night in a mending room, with a senator's heir getting rained on in the doorway of his education. Prima looks up. Her chin tucks a fraction. Her mouth is open on no number at all.

“Daphne's strap,” Prima says. “I remember.” She turns the border's underside to the light. “Nothing is ever that mended, mistress. Only the person who did it knows. To everyone else it's just the straight of the thing.” She ties off a thread that does not require tying, a fuller's daughter's certainty: she will be told in this order. “Father says to thank the house for the soup inspection system. He says he's being governed by women in two constituencies now and the empire's the better for it.”

“Tell him—” Antonia finds, in the third book's cedar-dark behind her ribs, a dozen sentences, all addressed to the wrong person: apologies, explanations, a report of a death falsely filed, a name. The drill, rehearsed like fire procedures, holds. “Tell him the house is governed the same way and charges more for it.”

She does not touch Prima's work with her mother's hands. She pays for it with a creditor's. The difference, God and the guild help her, is where she currently lives.

Barbatus's lantern does the Thursday dusk as escort furniture. On the bridge Prima says — and this will come back to the Caelian in the emptied lantern, faithfully, in a doorkeeper's Latin — that the house smells of roses even in winter, and that she dreams now of courtyards; of a woman counting coins in the dark, getting it wrong, beginning again. Barbatus reports it to Antonia in the doorway without interpretation, because interpretation is what kills messengers in every other sort of household, and Antonia stands a long moment among the evening's resuming preparations with her hands doing nothing at all for the first recorded time that winter.

“Get it right tomorrow, then,” Eirene says from somewhere near the lamps, in the tone of a woman announcing soup. “Cream before the Alexandrians, love. And your counts generally.”

What she does instead — it will be very important to her later that there was an instead, and that it was work — is register. On the first morning of the new system, by appointment, at a stated hour, when a woman may be dressed for an audience with the state, Antonia Cassia attends the aediles' office in person, with Diomedes two paces behind and the first book under his arm in its upright dullness, and files her house for the quarter under the general registry that a Cornelius piloted through the Senate at the price of Syria.

The official is the one who found her form too small for the facts. He has a bigger form now. It has been designed by men who expect larger facts and have left, near the bottom, a space that a clerk in a previous reign would have used for omens. He looks at Antonia across a desk that has prosecuted market frauds since before either of them was fluent, and he does not ask about the inspection, the committee, the death between courses, or the glass that turns out, in his office's gossip, to have been emeralds all along. He asks for the names.

Diomedes gives them in the order of the evening: status, registration, manumission where manumission applies, each woman a file with a face she has consented to be filed by. The new provision is cited at the foot, in Antonia's own instruction, as the house's governing text for its contracts. The official reads it standing — officials in this winter are doing a great deal of reading standing in her presence; she files the phenomenon under draughts — and says, “The senator's clause.”

“The Senate's clause,” Antonia says. “I am told committees think in public now. Let us not spoil their education with attributions.”

He stamps the quarter. The stamp has a sound like a small, well-built door closing. Outside, Rome is registering itself at a walking pace: lodging houses, dining clubs, twenty-three categories of establishment arriving by appointment with their paperwork washed, while a scribe two stalls down is already doing a trade in copies of the posted text, whole and in extracts, the extracts principally clause-shaped. Antonia buys one. Not for her files — she has the text in Diomedes' second hand, in the box, between quarters. She buys it because on the walk home it is raining in the Roman winter way, insinuating itself into wool and acoustics, and a woman with a copy of the law in her document case walks differently through the city that wrote it at her: not safer, exactly; itemised. She sends the copy, that afternoon, by a carter with a history of darkness now fully reformed under house employment, to an address in Transtiberim. Not to a fuller’s house. To the fullers' guild office over the wine shop, where a clerk with a cough like a small dog will file it in the chest, among funeral lists and arrivals, with no covering letter and no name, like linen around glass.

She tells Prima nothing that day either. But a paper has gone into the girl's world that will be there when the telling is, and Antonia, who has lived by paper and been sold by it and freed by a widow's paragraph of it, knows what such advance parties are. The law goes first, quietly, and builds the road. Then, at an hour nobody's steward schedules, the people walk down it with their baskets, calling it as though it had always been there.

She tells Prima nothing that day, and nothing the next, because a fuller is dying at the pace of water and a girl is heating honey and counting stairs so they do not count her, and because Antonia Cassia, who has waited nineteen years inside a false report of a death, can wait until a true one has had its mourning. There are debts you do not collect during a deathwatch, whatever the currency. She has written the clause somewhere herself. Between the quarters.

Chapter Sixteen

A Funeral Across the River

. . .

Vibius dies in the hour before dawn, when the city's poor do most of their important business to avoid troubling the light. The guild pays for the pyre, as the guild pays for everything the trade has first made necessary. Prima washes the body with the guildswomen, who are kind in the competent way of women who have washed everything the world produces, and lays in the shroud a needle — not his, hers; her first, blunted now to the colour of river water — because a fuller goes out of Rome in the garment he made of his life, and she was, whatever the books in whatever hands may say, his making in every way the gods inspect.

The night before is measured in honey. Prima heats it at the hours the watch changes because the watch, passing the end of the street with its buckets, is the only clock the house can afford that works outdoors. First watch: he drinks, and jokes, in the whisper the room has agreed to call his voice this week, that the guild physician should be charged by the spoonful since the medicine is mostly her labour with thyme in it. Second watch: he asks for the bench by the frames, is refused by three women in council, and accepts the refusal the way he accepts weather in his trade, as a finding. Third watch: the cough takes up its residence documents and shows them to the room one by one, and Prima is up with the cup and the cloth and the other cloth, counting breaths with her mouth open the way she counts everything she is afraid of finishing.

By the fourth watch the street knows. Streets know these things in Transtiberim the way houses know them on the Palatine: through the plumbing, in its night register. A light in a fuller's window at an hour when fullers economise lamp oil is a sentence anybody passing can decline. The baker's mother arrives without soup, which is how the neighbourhood understands that the situation has passed the soup stage and entered government. She takes the fire from Prima without asking, as generals relieve exhausted subordinates, and sends Titus — flour still in his eyebrows from a night bake undertaken because tomorrow's bread does not stop for anybody's century — to fetch the guild women in an order she has clearly been rehearsing since the Saturnalia.

They come as the plural always comes: with shawls, basins, spare linen, opinions about water temperature, and a silence that is not the opposite of talk but its container. The eldest of them, the vats woman who has lately sold a great deal of thread to a Greek, puts her hand for one moment on Prima's shoulder — where a stripe would be in a family that promotes its daughters by sewing — and says, “Count with us, girl. It's work. Work's the ride.” And Prima, who has counted stitches, stairs by proxy, breaths, second columns and her father's sayings, understands that the washing of a dead fuller by the women of his trade is also a count: so many cloths, so much water no worse used, a body made ready with the competence the world has always demanded of women it declines to register.

Her father, laid out, looks less grey. The trade in him relaxes out of him like dye out of an unrinsed garment, and what is left is the man under the fuller, the one her mother saw at an island market counting a porter's load wrong and deciding a life on the correction. She washes his hands last. They have carried other people's clothing through urine and earth and out the other side clean for forty years, and they lie now with the nails trimmed by his daughter and the thumbs quiet, like tools set down correctly after use. She lays the needle in beside them, out of a bookkeeping no guild keeps: his making, her instrument; her making, his workmanship. The women see it and say nothing. In this neighbourhood a signature in a shroud is nobody's business except the fire's.

Then there is the house to be governed, because death in two rooms is also an administrative event. The guild chest sends its contribution with a clerk whose cough apologises ahead of him up the street. The pyre place outside the walls is spoken for, at the poor men's hour, with wood whose price Mother Livia negotiates down by a method involving the words the bakery knows your family. Titus's father, an oven of a man who speaks in loaves, sends bread for the mourners and stays away himself, from a delicacy the street understands: too many father-shaped men in a room spoil the proportions of grief. By the time the winter light gets its one bar into the yard, the household has become what Vibius made it for thirty years it will not have him — ordered, ferociously, like a thing being held steady for a woman who is about to have to walk behind it through the rain holding nobody.

The funeral winds through Transtiberim in the rain. It rains in Rome for funerals of every class, out of fairness or habit. The baker's family walks in the position of almost-relatives, which the baker's mother discharges like a magistracy. Marcus, who has heard of the death the way he hears everything, through the plumbing, comes to stand hatless at the procession's edge in a plain cloak; he does not approach; Daphne's return of a necklace has taught him at least the outline of the lesson that grief is not an audience. Barbatus walks the whole route in the neighbourhood's ranks where he has no legal place and an entirely unchallenged one, carrying, when the bearers tire, the bier's front pole without being asked, in the manner of men who express condolence by weight.

They take him out by the yard gate because the front door of a fuller's house is for customers' garments, and Vibius, whatever else the books in whatever hands may say, was never his own customer. The bearers are guild men in their festival cloaks gone dark at the shoulders with rain. Six of them carry in rotation; three more walk the rotation empty-handed, spelling, the way reliefs are worked at the vats when a heavy piece comes through. Barbatus falls in at the first corner without a word to anybody, between a tanner's apprentice and a widower from the street of the rope-makers, and his great weather of a body does to the procession what ballast does to a ship in Marcus's current philosophy: nobody praises it, everything arrives.

Prima walks behind the bier in the place the neighbourhood has silently surveyed for her. Not veiled like a senator's daughter — veils across the river are working cloth, and hers has her own stitching in the hem, an early piece, pre-Caelian prices. She does not wail. There are women for wailing in the guild, two of them, with the professional lungs of an older economy, and they perform the grief of the street at the correct volume while Prima performs hers by competence: she counts. She counts the turnings where the bearers change, because at each turning the pole must be passed like a relay baton in a richer people's game. She counts doorways with somebody standing in them in the posture of respect — tradespeople taking one step out of the wet, a hand lifted, a word for the deceased filed under his trade rather than his name: a clean fuller, that one; a man who paid on the day; Claudia's husband; the girl's father.

The rain collaborates with the route's low places. At the lane by the Temple the water is over the stepping stones, and the front bearers slow, and it is there that Barbatus takes the pole's weight whole for the length of the puddle, one shoulder under the front corner like a man holding up a piece of roof in a story. Nobody applauds. That is how you can tell it is not the arena. Titus is at Prima's elbow by then — not holding it, exactly; the neighbourhood has strong views about elbows and betrothals, even at funerals, especially at funerals — but present at the angle where a slip would become his business. He has left the ovens in his brother's charge and brought, of all the useless and necessary things, the dry end of his own cloak turned outward against the rain's angle, so that the girl walking beside him gets marginally less weather than the rest of Transtiberim. It is a small, complete act of government. Prima notices. Mother Livia, two rows back in the magistracy of almost-relatives, notices Prima notice, and revises nothing aloud.

At the bridge end, where the route turns for the road outside the walls, a senator's son is standing hatless in a plain cloak that is failing to be plain in the way of expensive things in poor streets. The procession notices him at the speed Servilia hears things in another constituency.

The wailing women lower their key by a professional fraction. Marcus does not step forward, does not offer the condolence coin, does not make the small, fatal gesture by which his class buys a place in other people's photographs. He stands in the rain with water finding the places in his education where the tutors skipped chapters, and he looks at the bier, and then — once, and for less time than a held note in a music room — at the girl walking behind it counting doorways, and something in his face does the thing faces do in his family at moments of unminuted honesty: nothing, thoroughly, at cost. Prima does not see him. She is counting. Barbatus sees him, files him, and moves his shoulder six inches so that his shadow falls between the heir of the Cornelii and the fuller's procession for the length of the bridge turning, which in the day-book of no house whatsoever is entered as manners, further education of.

Outside the walls the pyre ground smokes in the wet like the city's memory of all its other mornings. There are cheaper fires further off, and one grand one, two streets of cypress away, where an equestrian family has hired flutes and is getting its money's worth out of the acoustics. The guild's plot is in between, as guild things are: respectable, rained on, carefully measured. They lay Vibius with his needle in the shroud and a coin from the chest and a piece of unbleached cloth the women have argued about briefly and included unanimously. The priest the guild keeps for such work says the words at a pace suitable to wet wood.

Prima does not look away when the fire takes. She has heated honey on small fires for the dying all winter; she understands tending as a form of loyalty that does not require the patient's cooperation. While the flames negotiate with the rain in the language both have spoken since Romulus, she counts the guildsmen filing past with their contributions and condolences, and her mouth is open on the numbers, and Titus's cloak is at its angle, and the baker's mother is crying in the place nobody can itemise, which as it turns out is behind the wailing women, professionally camouflaged. Somebody says Claudia's name then, the way names surface at pyres, and somebody else — with wine already in them though it is not yet the first hour by any respectable sundial — says she'd be proud of the keeping, and the old vats woman looks hard at the speaker and says, “Drink at home,” in a voice that rearranges the conversation's seating. But the word keeping has been said aloud beside a fire, in the hearing of the great world, and gone up with the smoke where the city's stories live until they are brought down again by somebody's dinner.

Antonia does not come. She sends Eirene, who has buried people from every century of her own life and knows how to be present as furniture: steady, unremarked, holding what needs holding. Eirene comes back across the bridge in the evening with wet hems and a report in her filing voice. “She did her father's washing proud. The baker boy kept hold of her elbow at the pyre like a man steadying a ladder — not taking the climb off her, just holding the ladder. I liked him for it. The mother cried where nobody could itemise it.”

“And Prima?”

“Counted the guildsmen as they came past the pyre.” Eirene wrings her hem into the courtyard drain with strong wrists. “Under her breath. Mouth open on the numbers. Antonia, my love, you cannot wait out of delicacy much longer. Grief makes people honest at retail. Somebody at those vats is telling that girl, tonight, with wine in them, the story of the hennaed woman. It is what funerals are for, among the poor: the redistribution of the truth.”

“Retail honesty,” Antonia says. “Is that the phrase of the season across the river, or have you coined it on the bridge?”

“I have buried people since before you could price a room, Antonia. The coinage accrues.” Eirene accepts, without being offered it, the chair in Antonia's office that is never offered to anyone: the one with its back to the accounts. She is in her outdoor shawl, damp through one shoulder, and she looks, suddenly, terribly, like the girl from the Subura house who learned to keep one mystery and no illusions in a corridor where the mirrors were held by other people's daughters. “There was wine at the edge of that crowd by the first hour. There's always wine at the edge. Wine is how the poor file their evidence — out loud, to strangers, in the certainty somebody's clerk is listening. Tonight the hennaed woman is a story in the vats with a beginning and a middle and a place where a girl of nineteen is doing the sum on her way home in the rain. Either she hears it from us tomorrow in a room with a door and a needle to hold, or she hears it in pieces for a year and assembles it the way Rome assembles its columns: the top of it out of sight, the carving done by anonymous hands."

Antonia has been arranging tax receipts for two hours. She now discovers that she has arranged them, with the unerring instinct of her hands when they do not ask her permission, into the shape of the year itself: inspections here, physician's account there — it has been that kind of winter. She sets the stylus down in exact alignment with the tablet's edge, an act of government she no longer bothers to pretend is influence over anything larger than the province of the desk.

"How does one tell it well?" she asks, and it is not a question she has asked any living person since Baiae. She hears it in the room like a request for the small room at the Greek's. "In the order of the evening, Eirene, the evening is twenty-one years long and most of it is stairs."

"Then we begin with the stairs and not with the committee." Eirene leans forward, elbows on knees, in the posture women in this city assume for the governance of the unspeakable, having assumed it for childbeds, deaths, betrothals and the reading of men's letters since letters were invented to be left open on dressing tables. "You tell it as work. It's the only language that girl won't suspect of being a chair she's meant to faint in. She has a trade, a counting voice and a father in the ground across the river as of this forenoon. If you go at her with 'my child' in the first sentence you'll lose her to the doorway, and I don't blame any daughter of Claudia's for using doorways correctly; she comes by it in several genealogies. Tell the work. The mirror, the stairs, the man, the money, the report. Then the thread. Then what you propose, which I trust, as your junior partner in catastrophe, is nothing, at her prices, with the paperwork available."

Antonia looks at her for a long time in the lamp. "You have rehearsed this on the bridge too."

"I rehearsed it in the Subura, love. We all did our versions of that speech in that house. Yours is the only one that has ever got to be delivered in premises the speaker owns." Eirene rises and takes the damp out of the room with her, the way she always takes the weather: personally, and onward to where it is needed. At the door she stops with her hand on it and doesn't turn round, because in this friendship there is a whole economy of not-turning-round that has served since they were both other men's property, and says, "Bring soup. Whatever the small rooms in bankers' offices do without it, our rooms needn't. Tell it in a working room, with stuff on the table for her hands. If we've learned anything from nineteen years of her across the river existing at full rate, it's that the hands confess first. Give hers something true to hold."

Antonia looks up from the tax receipts, which she has been arranging for two hours in an order comprehensible only to the recently bereaved. "Tomorrow," she says. "Here. Not at the vats. I will send Barbatus with a commission urgent enough to be respectable."

"And if she's already been told, badly?"

"Then I will tell her again, well. It will not be the first thing in this city I have had to launder."

■

The morning offering is a small government too, and this morning it has a full agenda. There is rain in the compluvium's basin to be heard over; there is Cornelia at the far door of the shrine room with her hands correctly folded and her attention visibly elsewhere, a position perfected at family sacrifices since she was nine and the household discovered she could do her scales silently with her eyes open; there is Marcus, who is not there. His absence is entered, by the steward, as the young master is at the baths. It is not yet the hour for baths. Nobody corrects the entry.

In this family the day-book's fictions have always been load-bearing, and Lentulus, pouring the offering with his father's hands at the ends of his own sleeves, finds he cannot remember whether he taught the boy that trick or merely inherited the building where it's kept.

“Marcus is across the river,” Servilia says, after the words have been said and the cup set down and the slave who carries the tray has been dismissed by a glance that functions, in her management, as a door closing. She says it exactly once, the way she drops sentences about other people's climates, and does not repeat it for the record. Cornelia, at the door, hears across the river arrive at the altitude where, in this house, geography is a euphemism with citizenship.

Her father looks at his wife. Then at the empty, correct space where his son should be standing in the order of the offertory procession. Then — the sequence is given here in the order of the morning, not the order of his questions — he says, “In the rain.”

“In a plain cloak, Onesimus believes. He forgot to see it professionally in three languages.” Servilia adjusts nothing about her own appearance; she never does when intelligence is being exchanged; fidgeting is for people who trade in coins of smaller denomination. “He will stand at the procession's edge, from what the plumbing tells me, and get wet in a way his tutors did not cover. It is not the worst education this family has arranged for an heir. It is merely the only one we did not.”

Cornelia says — because in this family, this year, the daughters have started saying things in doorways in a way that has the steward keeping a fourth set of books — “Should someone stand for us, Father?”

It is, as questions go in a shrine room, a very Cornelian one, which is to say that it displaces the emotional work onto representation. Lentulus looks at his daughter — sixteen, registered in every book the city keeps for girls of his order, dowered in figures her mother handles like weather — and he hears the clause he drafted at dawn with a barber waiting go past again, on its way to the courts, dressed in a sixteen-year-old's grammar. Standing for us would be exactly the scene his dead father taxed him to avoid imposing, the tax in the new currency paid by the wrong people at a pyre.

“Barbatus is standing for us,” he says, and discovers he believes it: a former gladiator in a neighbourhood procession, carrying a front pole by weight in the rain, is this family's entire effective foreign policy in Transtiberim at present, and better than most of what the Senate would have sent. “Your brother is standing for himself. It is a new arrangement. We will see how it files.”

“Marcus, standing for himself,” Cornelia says, tasting their father's new coinage for counterfeit. “That's the Greek song too, isn't it? The one for people who'd know.” She bows correctly to the shrine, to her parents, to the Lares' whole department of household arrangements, and goes to her lesson, and is heard through two doors to begin the exercise the second way.

It is after this — after the acoustics have decided what may be said where, after the slaves have performed their drilled withdrawal, after the morning has been properly constituted as a theatre with only the principals left on stage — that Servilia delivers, in the tone for provincial appointments, her intelligence about the other side of the river, and about what she has already done there with her brother's steward and a sum to a guild, unattributed.

Lentulus hears of the fuller’s death from Servilia, who tells him at the morning offering in the same tone she uses for provincial appointments, because in their house all intelligence now travels at that altitude, above the weather. “Your other — the girl across the river is burying her father today. Her father,” Servilia says, correcting the sentence as a general corrects a map. “The man who raised her. I have sent, through my brother's steward, a sum to the fullers' guild for widows and orphans of the trade, unattributed. It will reach her as the world reaches people like her: late, and through institutions, and smelling faintly of somebody else's conscience.”

Lentulus pours the offering. His hand — the household watches his hands at the shrine the way clients watch a banker's — does its work without visible cost. “You might have told me you meant to send it.”

“You might have told me, at any point in nineteen years, that you had a daughter. We are even, husband, in the great Cornelian ledger. We have both been settling your youth at a distance and charging the house for the mileage.” She sets the cup in its ring. “I knew Baiae. I did not know she lived. Your father charged my ignorance as the price of my cooperation, and I paid it — I want that in whatever minutes you are keeping now, in whichever of your rooms. I married a settlement, Lentulus. I made it work the way rain makes a roof work: by finding every hole for nineteen years. Do not now make the girl into one.”

It is the longest speech of their marriage. The slaves have withdrawn at its first sentence with the drilled instincts of a household that knows which weather is for indoors. Lentulus stands at the little shrine with the Lares gleaming dully in their niche — household gods, custodians of exactly this: the sanctity of a family's arrangements — and understands that he has been forgiven nothing and condemned of very little, which in Servilia's bookkeeping is the state called marriage.

“What would you have me do?” he asks.

Servilia does not answer in abstractions. Abstractions are for men composing, and she has a century to settle before the clients' hour is over. She tells him the route as if she were issuing kitchen orders in another house across the city — for such, at this point, it is hard among their household gods to distinguish her logistics from a certain custodianship of stairs and dresses: Soter to the guild, not Onesimus, because a family's steward leaves footprints in other people's paperwork; the money to arrive as three things, never one, because one sum is a story and three are administration; the first already sent, unattributed, for widows and orphans — the general fund from which her individual case will be watered without a single name being carried separately like a stone in a sling.

“The second is the bequest you and — your creditor — drafted in a banker's other room.” She says your creditor the way men of her husband's class say the Greek: a function, a ministry, a force of weather in a veil. It is, Lentulus understands with the part of him a dead man named forwarding address, the most respectful word available in this house for the woman his father sold, and Servilia, who is precise about such denominations as registers, knows exactly what it costs her to use it. It costs her nothing she does not choose to spend. That too is in the ledger now.

“The third,” she continues, “is not money at all. It is your continued absence, maintained at the standard of a public work. I have had the house's instructions about Marcus amended: he is not to be prevented at the garden gate, he is to be witnessed at it, which has always been our system with heirs and aqueducts. If he stands in rain across rivers of his own motion, the house will let the day-book say the baths. A boy who is learning manners at the full rate should not be interrupted by his family's bookkeeping arriving behind him in a carrying chair.”

Lentulus looks at the Lares, who have supervised three centuries of this family's arrangements and never once asked to see the paperwork. “You have it all drafted.”

“I have had it drafted since the oysters, husband. I merely lacked, until your father chose better through you, an administration that would file it.” She adjusts her veil for the household's public morning — the veil is state architecture, and on her it works. “There is a further matter. The girl's telling, which is not ours to schedule — attend to this, as it is the interesting clause — will happen in a house where the women are registered, the tax is paid quarterly, and the mistress counts faster than any of us. When it has happened, there will be consequences in the plumbing. A fuller’s daughter does not learn she is a Cornelius's by-blow in a linen room without the news taking the waters to every bath in Rome by the new moon, attenuated, adorned, and useless for anything except making the Avidian contract a document we wish to have signed in fair weather. Therefore the contract is to be brought forward. My brother will write today. The figures are ready to be weather.”

It lands, as all her briefings land, leaving him in command of the ground she has chosen. What surprises him — surprises: at forty-five, after this of all winters, the senses still report novelties like provinces applying for annexation — is that he is not diminished by it. He married a settlement and it has become, in the rain, in the finding of every hole, something his father's Latin lacks a dative for. In the doorway, re-entering the house's public constitution, he stops his wife with the one piece of intelligence at his own altitude: “She said the person wronged was not me. The creditor. In the banker's room.”

“Then we are three in agreement,” Servilia says, “the dead, the creditor, and the wife. History will call it the Senate. Come to breakfast, Lentulus. Marcus will be home for it, wet through, with the news that everybody buried a fuller very decently in the rain, and I wish to see whether your son can deliver it in the order of the morning.”

He does come home for it, which the steward enters as the young master returned, weather, a form of words whose elasticity this house is coming to rely upon the way fleets rely on ballast. He has changed out of the plain cloak into dry wool that costs conspicuously more, and his hair is doing the thing young men's hair does after rain when it is innocent of barbers, and at the threshold of the dining room he performs — before slaves, ancestors by proxy, a father lately unsealed and a mother in full sail — the small miracle his winter's expensive, unminuted education has been arranging without his permission: he says nothing about himself at all.

“A fuller was buried very decently across the river,” he says. “The guild were out in strength. The baker held the ladder, is how I'd file it. Barbatus carried.” He takes the cup his mother has positioned within prophecy's reach and drinks it, slowly, the way a woman on the Caelian once instructed him in front of witnesses. “There was a girl counting the guildsmen past the pyre. Under her breath. Her mouth was open on the numbers. I didn't —” Marcus stops, in the middle of his own morning, like a sentence coming right at the second count. “I stood at the edge. It seemed the available manners.”

Cornelia, across the table, looks up from an egg she has been conducting like a small province. She looks at her brother, and then at her father, and then, because she is Servilia's daughter and this is the season of daughters in doorways, she looks at nobody at all and says, “Define edge,” at a volume a music master would call indicative.

Her father does not rebuke her. The form for it is in fair copy somewhere in the house, yellowing. He pours for his son instead — watered, at the rate for mornings when a man has been across a river in other people's weather — and says, in the first book's hand, upright and dull: “It was correctly observed, Marcus. The house records it.” And the clerk at the side table, who has been writing who came, what they asked, what it will cost when it comes back since Marcus was in a smaller chair than this one, writes nothing down about the funeral across the river, which in a new system that nobody has yet voted on, in a household learning its future in another woman's grammar, is the most serious form of record.

“The dowry, through the guild, as agreed with —” she does not say the name in the shrine room; names, like knives, are put away in her house after use “— as agreed. Then stay away from the girl's life with the same talent you have employed for nineteen years, but this time as a kindness she can spend. And Lentulus—” Servilia turns at the door with her veil arranged and her war over for the morning “—when Cornelia marries the Avidius boy, which she will, you will stand there like a man who has given a daughter, not settled a debt. We owe the register that much acting. It is the one tax your class still pays in full.”

Chapter Seventeen

In the Order of the Evening

. . .

She tells her in the small room off the courtyard where the linen is kept, because it is where Prima's hands will know what they are for if the rest of her forgets. There is a commission on the table — spring hangings, genuinely — and Eirene within call, and the door not quite shut, which in Antonia's house has always been a policy about conversations: nothing true here should require a lock.

She has had the room prepared the way she prepares for a difficult guest: by removing everything that could be made to testify about the hostess. No Greeks' strongboxes, by proxy or metaphor. No paper. Diomedes has been instructed — and has instructed the house, in the hand nobody sees — that the small room off the courtyard is engaged for a linen consultation of unreasonable importance, with soup. The soup is Ammonius' morning stock clarified to a transparency he considers a moral position. It is to be brought by Eirene, without ceremony, at whatever point in the proceedings a door opening and shutting would be a form of punctuation rather than an escape route. After thirty years, Antonia trusts Eirene's punctuation over most men's prose.

Barbatus went across the river at the second hour with the commission in its official form: spring hangings, urgent, the mistress will see the needlewoman herself about the return of the pattern. He delivered it standing in the fuller's yard among the frames, in his door-keeper's Latin, and then — because a man who carried a front pole in the rain has earned one uncommissioned sentence in that street for the rest of his natural life — he said to Prima, as to a recruit he was walking to a first posting: “Eat before. House'll feed you anyway, whatever the paperwork says. Eat before all the same. It's a rule with information.”

Antonia has rehearsed, of course. Antonia rehearses the way ships rehearse fire: not because she expects the drill to survive smoke, but so that her hands will know where the buckets are when the smoke makes philosophers of everyone else. There have been versions in the night office with Diomedes' practice tablet smoothed between paragraphs. In one version she begins with Baiae, in the belief that a bad flight of stairs honestly described might carry the rest; in another she begins with Claudia, the counting woman, because any story that gives Prima's mother-in-Transtiberim the first word is a story that cannot be accused in that girl's hearing of arriving to re-audit her. In a third version, which she burned in no fire because she drafts in wax and not in feelings, she began with I am sorry, and Eirene, consulted over the lamps like a consul over a war, eliminated it on procedural grounds: “Sorry is a door other people hold open, love. If you lead with it, she'll spend the hour trying to shut it for your comfort, and then we've spent her, on the first morning, exactly like everybody else with a name.”

So: work first. Soup as required. The spring linen on the table not as a pretext but as a true bill: there is a border; houses need borders; a length of cloth can hold twenty years the way a table holds a dinner, by not requiring anybody to look directly at anybody else until the fish course of the truth is ready. Antonia dresses for the occasion in the clothes she wears for the tax office and for no one else's theatre — plain, at full price, hair done by her own hands with a hairdresser's daughter's refusal to sit idle in that particular chair for any woman living — and at the third hour, with the house performing an afternoon it has been paid to make unremarkable, she hears Barbatus' step in the courtyard and another, lighter, under it, and the future arrives in mourning at her father's rates, carrying a work-box.

Prima comes in mourning, which in Transtiberim means her best dress gone dark at the edges and her hair done by the baker's mother into an arrangement of great respectability and no mercy. She has her work-box. She has, Antonia sees at once, been told something badly already — not the thing itself, perhaps, but its approach: the averted vat-women, an old woman's funeral wine loosening the phrase the money stopped, the way a room changes its temperature when a girl who was theirs in every way the gods inspect enters it. Grief has made the neighbourhood honest at retail.

It was at the pyre that the temperature of rooms began to change for Prima, though at the time she filed it under smoke. A man from the tanners' benches, with wine already in him, told his neighbour that Claudia Vibii kept that one close as thread on a spool, and small wonder, given the money in the sleeve of that winter — and then met the old vats woman's eye and found, suddenly, an urgent interest in the weather. At the guild meal afterwards, which is eaten standing because grief in a small property has nowhere to sit down, an aunt by guild addressed her as Vibius' girl with a stress on the name that Prima's ear, trained by bakers' mothers and music she has only overheard through doors, registered as new music. On the way home from the walls, with Titus's cloak no longer required for rain and therefore looming even larger as a declaration, Mother Livia said out of her own weather: “Whatever telling there's to be, girl, you're to hear it indoors, sitting, from somebody who keeps a house. Not at the vats. I won't have my future family informed out of a jar.”

Prima has been told, since she was old enough to hold a needle, that she takes things in, the way linen takes a dye. It is not always meant as praise. She has taken in, in seven days: a funeral, a guild chest's exact contribution, a father's place at the fire filled by his own absence in the posture of a small, complete government, a sentence about money stopping, an old woman's advice to sign yours, a blank space in her dead mother's leaves under a word she is still learning to decline. This morning Barbatus stood in the yard with a commission urgent enough to be respectable and a face she now knows how to read better than a pattern, and she put on her best dress gone dark at the edges and checked the spring linen's count one more time — right, at the second attempt — and walked behind him across the island bridge in air that smelled of wet stone and other people's breakfasts.

“Is it about the count being off by three flowers?” she asked him, at the bridge's crown, because it was the least expensive of the questions queuing in her.

“It's about the mistress wanting the room with the good light and the woman who works best in it to be in it at the same time,” Barbatus said. “Beyond that my instructions are a tactician's. Eat before, I said, and you haven't, because young people file wisdom under Other People's.” He produced, from somewhere in the weather of him, half a festival loaf of the bakery's third-best work — campaign rations, in this city, often arrive as baked goods — and they shared it walking, like soldiers in a ballad neither party would be caught singing. River under them: lights in pieces. Rome ahead of them: the mistress of the known world, as the inscription programme says, going about its morning in columns nobody at ground level can read whole.

She knew, by the Caelian gate, what the commission's real name was. Girls who hold other people's news steady for a living develop, at nineteen, a customs officer's sense of a sentence being smuggled. She did not know its terms, its order, its author, or its price. But the doorkeeper's silence had a soup-shaped hole in it, and the thread Greek had a face that went with a certain absence in a guild book's columns, and her father's whole love arranged like tools on a bench had been saying, for a month of evenings, the one word in his accounts that was never at the front.

Keeping, Prima thinks, with her work-box held correctly and her chin not yet doing anything she has decided about, on the threshold of the linen room where a rich woman is waiting with her hands flat on spring cloth. Let it be work, at least. Let it be told in a working room, with stuff on the table for her hands, at prices she can audit. She goes in as she was raised to go into other people's houses: as though she, and not the house, is the person who will be charged for any breakages.

“You sent for me about spring,” Prima says.

“I sent for you.” Antonia sets her hands on the linen, flat, the way she tested the courtyard wall for damp on a January morning when all the year's catastrophes were still correctly unscheduled. “Prima. I am going to tell you my life. Not because you asked, and not in the order of your questions, because your questions will be better afterwards. Interrupt anyway. It is a family failing.”

She tells it in the order of the evening. The house on the Quirinal. The mirror held at seventeen. A line of Greek about a woman at a loom, and a word said before it could be stopped. A young man's laugh. Teaching, and what houses call teaching when one party cannot leave them. A muster morning, a contract read upside down — with her increase — stairs in Baiae, a midwife's hennaed nails, money in a sleeve, a report: a girl, not strong. Standing up anyway, because the alternative arithmetic did not permit standing. Freedom in a will, loans to women, two tables, a house, a name assembled from good materials with no one's permission. And then a hanging with a border of small red flowers, and a needlewoman counting with her mouth open, and thread bought across the river by a Greek who kept his face like a book.

Prima listens the way she sews: entirely, with her whole posture given over to not dropping the work. At the money stopped her hands go still in her lap. At not strong she makes a sound that she converts, with a nineteen-year-old's ferocious governance of herself, into breath. When Antonia stops, the room contains linen, light through a high window, and two women at a table with twenty years laid on it like a length of cloth awaiting the shears.

It is Eirene who breaks the first silence the room constructs around itself, with soup, as punctuation. She sets two bowls down without asking anybody's cosmology and withdraws to the door that is not quite shut, where she will be within call and outside the record, an arrangement she has been perfecting since the Subura. The soup steams between them. Prima, out of habits stronger than history, apologises for eating in the house — her father's old foreign policy, arriving late to its own repeal — and then catches the apology in mid-air like dropped crockery and looks, for the first time since not strong, directly at the woman across the linen.

“He's a week buried,” she says. “His foreign policy can renegotiate.”

It is Antonia's cadence. It is Claudia's office. It is entirely Prima's, arrived at by needle and ladder in a fuller's house, and it goes through Antonia the way the laugh in the dining room changed key that night last month: lastingly. She picks up her own spoon, because policy in this house is modelled, never announced.

“Did they tell her?” Prima says. No one in the room needs the pronoun declined. “My mother. When she — when the money came and the arrangements. Did anyone tell her the whole invoice, or was she in your position, with the report?”

The question is better afterwards, as advertised, and it is the first one: not who am I, which is the Senate's version, but was my other mother also lied to in the upright hand. Antonia answers it at the level the household can bear, which is Diomedes' three columns, smoothed for telling: the steward who settled things at distance, the sums that arrived like weather through other people's hands, the absence of any paper in a laundress's name that a counting woman could have audited. “I believe she was told a child whose people could not be named in the neighbourhood. I believe she made a better story out of it than the one she was sold, the way she made everything she was given to keep. By the second winter, a tanner's widow says, your father would have taken you for nothing. By then the money was just the tax the arrangement paid to look respectable in a guild book.”

Prima eats a spoonful of soup with the air of a person conducting an interview with it. “She signed her leaves with stairs,” she says. “Under Kept, there's a space with a mark beside it. I found it the night before—” She does not say the funeral, because in this room the words have work to do and she is allocating them like thread. “I thought the count wasn't finished. Father said a completed book is a dead one.”

“Then we are agreed on the form of the record,” Antonia says quietly. “This conversation is not a completion. It is a column added where you can check the carry.” She does not reach for the girl across the soup. Doorways, offers, hands — the whole Antonian system of not holding: everything in her has been trained, at rates other people set, not to make an advance the other party must process as a cost. Instead she puts, into the work space between them, the one document she has allowed into the room: nothing. The empty table, the spring linen, two bowls. “Ask me the ones that are left, Prima. In any order. It is the last time this week anybody in Rome will tell you that in a room where you outrank the furniture.”

Prima looks, briefly, like laughing, and does not. It goes into her hands instead, which are finding — under the table, where confidences in her family have always been expressed — the exact place on her own wrist where a goddess of the river was said, for nineteen years of baths and needlework and guild inspectors' thumbs, to keep her hold so that a kept thing should not be lost.

■

“The wrist,” Prima says at last. She turns her left hand over. The pale mark, the half-closed eye. “My mother — my mother in Transtiberim — used to say it was where the goddess of the river kept her thumb on me so I wouldn't be lost. She said every kept thing has a thumbprint.” She looks up. “She knew, then. All my life she was telling me in that way. And Father. Keeping especially. That was — he said that to me, a month ago. I thought it was the fever being fond.”

“It was your father being accurate. It is the family's other failing.” Antonia's voice performs its duties. Her hands remain flat on the linen, holding the cloth of the world in place by main housekeeping. “I will tell you his name too, because you are owed the whole invoice. But understand what names are in this city: his will open no door for you that your needle hasn't, and it may close several your betrothal needs. That is not my shame speaking, or his — though we both keep accounts in that currency — it is the tax office. Everything is the tax office, in the end. I have paid it for twenty years to be let alone. I propose to go on paying it for you.”

“Is it—” Prima stops. She looks toward the courtyard, where Marcus's laugh, some evenings ago, arrived ahead of him like a herald. She does the arithmetic of faces. Dark brows. A mouth open on a count. A senator's son who shared, for an instant at a doorway, something she had filed under Rome manufacturing girls. “Oh,” Prima says, with a seamstress's bleak admiration for a well-hidden join. “The committee.”

“The committee.”

“And the boy who corrected — whom I corrected. In your dining room. About his sister.”

“Your brother,” Antonia says. “Half, by the law's arithmetic. Wholly, by the arithmetic your mother kept. When you told him not to talk about his sister that way — I want it in the record, since no clerk will put it there — you were the only person in Rome that evening speaking of the Cornelii as a family. Including the Cornelii.”

“Say his name, then,” Prima says, in the voice she uses for second columns. “Since I'm owed the whole invoice. I would like it with all the names in. It's my trade. I check hems by what they say about how a garment was treated when nobody was looking.”

“Gnaeus Cornelius Lentulus.” Antonia gives it the way she gives her own name at bankers': level, without interest charged on the saying. “A former consul — suffect, as the family minutes concede — senator, committee's late chairman, father of Marcus who is learning manners and of Cornelia who is shortly to be allied with, and, for a quarter now, my debtor in olives at a Greek's office. He was twenty-four and I was seventeen and his father's house was Rome, in the form Rome took for girls who held mirrors. He asked one question afterwards. He accepted one answer, because it was the one that let him keep his inheritance of himself. That is the whole of my willingness to draft his portion in this room. He may attend for his own cross-examination in a year that is not this girl's betrothal winter.”

Prima turns the name over in the silence of a woman inspecting foreign coin for milling. “It was on the posters. The registry. I bought a copy of the text off a scribe by the island bridge, half price for the one extract.” She says it with a seamstress's appreciation of a discount where she has found one. “Mother Livia says it's a strange son-in-law present from a father — a law where a woman's no exists in the books. My mother —” The word trips, is caught, is set down correctly by the person who owns all its uses now. “My mother in Transtiberim would have filed it under her leaves. Kept: refusals.”

“It will do more work there than his name will do you.” Antonia lays out the rest of the invoice without gilt: the acknowledgement that will not occur, in public, in her lifetime or Cornelia's marriage negotiations; the money that will, through guild and bequest, in forms a baker's mother can inspect like hems and find respectable; the conditions, which are Antonia's whole religion in this room, first service and second. “Nothing arrives from the Palatine with a name on it. Nothing is asked of you — not correspondence, not appearances in doorways, not a procession at anybody's pyre. If you want, in time, a letter, you will say so to me, and I will see it in his own hand, costed. If you want never, then never is what's registered, in every sense the Senate has lately been taught.”

“My wedding's in the guild book for after the mourning,” Prima says, “and the oven share is in my tools column, which Mother Livia has recited to two priests. Can your money arrive without making my marriage look bought? Because it wasn't.” There is a colour now in the first person that Antonia recognises out of a Subura mirror. “Titus held the ladder before there was any of this. I want that at the front of the book, Antonia —” The name, used back, does a small revolution in the room's government. She hears it too and does not flinch from the expenditure. “— I want my life that I had this morning to stay mine, with extra. Not replaced. Arrived, like the guild says. In the household I already keep.”

“Then keep it as household money,” Antonia says. “A widow's portion for the house, guild money for the pyre — that part is done, at their rates, not mine — and the bequest enlarged on the tools heading, as a dead Baiae lady's remembrance of your mother's stairs. Anybody inspecting will find a world in which women pay women at long distances and men write it down as weather. It has the advantage of being true in every particular the guild would check." She opens her hands flat on the linen, palms up, an act of government over another province now: the display of emptiness. "And I am entered nowhere in it, Prima, except in the commission for spring hangings, by the piece, thread separate. That entry you can show your mother-in-law until the vintage."

Prima is crying now, in the way of her trade and her river: without sound, achieved at the eyes, wiped with the back of a wrist that has work to do. "I don't know what to call you."

"Antonia will do. I assembled it myself. It has held heavier." She moves then — slowly, in the order of the evening; nothing true here requires a lock, but some things require asking — and takes the girl's left hand in hers and turns it, palm up, thumb resting, for one breath, beside the pale mark rather than on it. "Your mother in Transtiberim counted stairs so they wouldn't count her. She counted you, Prima. Every day of your life, at her own rates, and the count came right. I am not arriving to re-audit her. I am arriving, late — the family opens things late — to say that the report was false, the money was a crime filed as kindness, and the daughter lived and sews better than anyone in Rome. The rest is dowry and spring hangings, and will keep until it doesn't."

Outside, the house performs its afternoon: the cook arguing with Alexandria by way of saffron, Barbatus telling the porter a story whose preamble lengthens with each telling, a dove on the tiles with its soft stupid music. Prima picks up, because her hands require it and so, she understands, does every woman in her blood whichever riverbank filed them, the spring linen, and begins the border.

"Red flowers again," she says, when she can. "You'd think a fine house would vary it."

"A fine house repeats what works," Antonia says, "and calls it taste. Show me the stitch that doesn't remember itself. I never learned. Hairdressers' daughters; we only learned to hold the mirror for other people's repairs."

The stitch that doesn't remember itself is taught, as all the house's real business is taught, by showing once and then watching at the correct distance. Prima takes a torn length from the mending basket — not the spring linen, not the spring linen, Eirene says from the door, arriving with more water and the exact air of a woman who has buried people from every century of her life for the privilege of saying so — and shows, with her mouth shut now and her whole attention in the quarter inch of damaged cloth, how a thread can be taken across a tear at an angle that lets the warp forgive it. Antonia follows on a second piece. Her hands, which can count coin in the dark and test plaster for treason, are beginners' hands here. It does not distress her. Nothing has distressed her in this room since the soup, which is how she knows, in Diomedes' hand behind her ribs, that she is paying for it all elsewhere and at compound rates.

"Looser," Prima says.

"I am accused of many tightnesses in this city. You may record the first." The stitch goes in at the forgiving angle and holds. "Your mother taught you."

"My mother taught me everything except this one, which the guild women did after, out of spite, they said, for the copyists at the Forum." Prima ties off, bites, inspects. "She said a seam is an argument for things being one thing that have been two. She said don't let the argument show its workings unless the workings are the point." She looks up from the unremarkable scar in the cloth with a young woman's first, unafraid directness since the work-box threshold. "Is it the point today, Antonia? The workings?"

"Today the workings are yours," Antonia says. She gives her cloth back across the table for inspection, customer to tradeswoman, and watches the customs officer's thumb pass over a knot of her own making with a fairness that goes through her like the Latin in a tax receipt. "What Rome sees will be a spring hanging. What you know about how it was held together is your property in the older sense: the kind no steward can hold against breakages.”

Eirene, from the door, makes the sound cash makes being recognised in a foreign country. She deposits the water and, on her way out, straightens Prima's mourning shawl at the shoulder with a hand that has straightened, in its time, a generation of girls in other people's houses before their great evenings. She does not say there, love, because she has never needed to say the words at their market price. Prima bears it. Later, walking home with Barbatus' lantern again, she will file the touch in the second column, under the general heading of women in this city who appear to have been keeping her accounts from various banks all her life without any of them, until today, presenting a bill.

What is said in the working hour is mostly of no account in the first book: the price of red dye since the Spanish boats, whether a banker can be trusted to itemise thread for an oven, how Daphne's return of the glass necklace has been entered in the street's books and what its current exchange rate is in Marcus. At the last of these Prima gives, quite suddenly and without the sound being recruited, the young, unregistered laugh of the girl at the ladder, and Antonia hears herself at seventeen over a scansion corrected, in a house that no longer stands, and does not put the cup down anywhere at all because there is no cup; there is a needle, going in and coming out. It is enough. Houses have been founded on less in this city and called it taste.

At the hour's end Prima rolls the work face inward and puts on her shawl at the angle her hair was done for respectability — and says, at the door that was never quite shut, the sentence that will go into no book anywhere except the fourth: “Next Thursday I'll come about the return of the border. If the count comes right before that, mistress— Antonia. I may have questions with names in them.”

“You may have questions at this house at your own prices.” Antonia opens the door herself, which in this building is a public act. “Barbatus will walk you to the crossing. Eat before next time, at whichever rates your street agrees with mine. It is a rule with information.”

“I had bread with my escort,” Prima says, with a seamstress's bleak satisfaction at a join well hidden. “Campaign rations. It is apparently a family system.”

That night, across the river, the house measures it by honey no longer required. The pot is scrubbed and put away in its place; the bench by the frames has been given to the drying; a place at the fire has gone the way of chairs in greater houses after deaths — respected, unoccupied, discussed by nobody at any price the room can afford. Mother Livia brings bread this time instead of soup, because the neighbourhood has moved by its calendars into the provisions phase of mourning, where people are fed in advance of needing anything. She looks at Prima's face with the baker's thumb of her whole personality resting, lightly, along the edge of it, and says: “The Caelian money come with instructions?”

“Spring hangings,” Prima says. “By the piece. Thread separate.”

“And other customs business.” It is not a question. Ministries, in the generation above Prima's betrothal, don't always require one. “I told you: you'd hear it indoors, sitting, from somebody who keeps a house. The vats haven't run this family since my own marriage and they won't start over a girl with honest hems.” She cuts the bread with a knife that has raised four sons and a business and sets the largest piece where Vibius's would have been, not out of piety — Mother Livia's pieties all have uses — but so that Titus, coming in with the night bake in his hair, will take it without ceremony and the place will be a place again by means of appetite, which is how most successions are managed among the poor.

Titus takes it. He looks at his betrothed over it with the expression of a man steadying a ladder in a new building. “You're counting something that isn't stitches,” he says.

“Questions with names in them. Due Thursday.” She puts her work-box down in the place it lives and does not open it. Inside it, under the needles, a dead woman's leaves continue not to be a book. “Titus. If a bequest came to this house through the guild — an old Baiae lady, my mother's mistress, dead convenient and well-disposed on paper — and it enlarged the tools column and put your family's oven partly in my name — would your mother inspect it as bought?”

Mother Livia, by the fire, makes a sound that in another woman might be the beginning of a career in prophecy. Titus, who has grown up between ovens and second columns, says with the caution of a man named in whichever document this is training to be: “I'd want to know the dead lady's name could be read aloud.”

“It can. That's the bit that took the hours.” Prima sits down in the household's new seating, at a place that after today exists because she is taking it. “Everything else is like the seam I showed you: you can feel it hold. The workings are mine. My father's,” she says — and the room goes through the small re-rigging it has been practising all winter around that word, sails adjusted, nobody overboard — “my father knew who held this house when the money stopped. We're not being changed, Titus. We're being kept, at better rates. It is apparently the family system on every bank there is.”

Later, when the bakery people have gone into the street's ordinary night and the frames drip their last into the yard, she opens the leaves and looks for a long time at the space under Kept, with its little unfinished mark like a stitch counted twice. She does not write her name in. Not yet. A completed book, her father said, out of her mother's whole unminuted philosophy, is a dead one. Instead she takes the spring linen from its roll and, in the border where no copyist would find it and no aedile's form has a column to tax it, works one flower wrong by a single petal — an extra petal, gone back into the wool and nearly invisible, the stitch that does remember itself, if you know the room and the rates at which she has been paid — and goes to bed in a world altered at every point and altered in no particular the tax office will be able to measure by Thursday.

They work an hour. It is not a reconciliation, there being nothing to reconcile except the past, which does not attend meetings. It is the thing itself, which Rome, for all its Latin, has only short words for: kin, at a table, with work between them so their hands could be honest while their faces caught up.

Chapter Eighteen

Marcus Learns a Word

. . .

Marcus discovers he has a sister the way he discovers most structural facts about his family: late, loudly, and in the wrong room. The room is the baths. The instrument is a dice creditor with a cousin at the fullers' guild, where a dowry for a fuller’s daughter has just been registered in circumstances the guild's clerk described, in drink, as Baiae money, old money, Quirinal-handled — the three adjectives travelling, as information does, faster disreputably than clean. It reaches Marcus between the warm room and the cold plunge, unattributed, deniable, and with Prima's trade attached like a label. He stands in the plunge with the water shocking up his body and the arithmetic shocking up his mind — faces at a doorway, a correction in a dining room about a sister — his sister, as it transpires, twice over — and does the first adult thing of his life: he does not say it aloud in the baths.

The creditor's name, for the record his father will never be offered in the study, is Lucius Hostilius, he is twenty-three, and he owes Marcus money at dice and pays in information because it is cheaper and, in the baths' economy, less taxable. He has the information today in the showy condition of a man who has carried it across three rooms without spilling the best part: still foaming. He delivers it at the exact moment the ball game breaks up, when young men are towelling themselves into temporary philosophers and a story can be tested against a whole audience of wet elbows.

“You'll like this,” Hostilius says, meaning the opposite, as men do when a story has a door in it other people may presently be invited to walk through. “The fullers' guild registered a dowry last week that their clerk — cousin of mine, a throat like a wine shop — says smells of the Quirinal through cedar. Baiae bequest, the papers say. Dead lady of property, remembering a laundress. Money for tools and a share in a bakery oven." He could stop there. The baths, which have produced three false deaths in a fortnight and buried them at no expense, lean in as one man for the part they have really booked. "Only the bequest's papers were drafted in the Greek's outer office at the Basilica. The one whose small room —" He leaves the small room in the air between the warm room and the cold plunge like a song at the wrong speed, and young Avidius, who has been oiling himself with the industry of a man ballasting for weather, says without looking up, "Lucius. Plunge. Now. It's a rule with information."

It is the first true act of friendship Marcus has been offered in a public place, and it arrives in the form of a shipping heir ordering a third party into cold water.

In the plunge Hostilius, penitent and blueing, gives him the rest of it the way men give evidence when the room has shrunk to a temperature: a needlewoman's name, a trade, a phrase in drink — old money, Quirinal-handled — a girl across the river who has been noticed, this winter, correcting senators' sons in dining rooms and being paid at a great house by the piece with the thread itemised separately. Avidius, up to his waist in the same water, helps the catching of it not at all, which is his own contribution: he becomes, for four minutes, furniture with a pulse. He does not say I was in that dining room. He does not say my father's figures are about to be weather in your house. He says, when Hostilius has been in long enough for the truths to cool to their right temperature: "You owe him the dice still. This is not a currency either of us banks."

Marcus, whose education this winter has included, term by unpaid term, a returned necklace, a corrected sentence, a funeral at an edge, and the entire sound the Senate makes not answering, hears the arithmetic go up his mind the way it must once have gone up someone else's in a house with damp in one wall, counting with her mouth open on the number. Nineteen. A face at a doorway, with music. Dark brows. A girl who said she isn't here to tell it wrong herself about his sister — his sister, in every construction his tutors ever parsed, arriving now in duplicate like a verb with two endings and a will of its own.

The cold does the rest of his thinking for him, the way it did once for Acilius' counsel in another plunge on another floor of the family's plumbing. It clarifies. It makes the body's opinion of shouting unanimous. He climbs out, accepts the towel a slave hands him — Onesimus is not here today; this is the son's establishment, manned by a Felix of the rising generation who forgets at slightly cheaper rates — and says, to the room at large, in a voice he has never before used in public for the reason that until today he had nothing to spend it on: “A bequest from Baiae. Half the laundresses in Rome had mistresses there. The stairs alone would keep a guild of widows in property.” The laugh goes up where he has put it — at the stairs, never mind whose, at Baiae in the abstract, at the idea of laundry bequests as a class — and the story, deprived at its source of the only reaction that could have made it a fortune, subsides back into the baths' general weather: one more rumour in the steam, unminuted, walking home underneath its author's ribs at a pace very close to a religious procession already, except that no god Marcus has been brought up with uses doors in Transtiberim.

He goes home. He finds his father alone, which the household arranges for him with a speed that tells its own story; Servilia, it develops, has been scheduling this conversation since the oysters, and intends it to happen in a room with no knives in it. The study qualifies. There are only scrolls, and the dented mirror, and three centuries looking on from the corridor.

“Is it true?” Marcus says. He has rehearsed seventeen openings between the baths and the Palatine, each more forensic than the last. This is the one that survives the doorway.

Lentulus, who has had weeks, has rehearsed one, and it deserts him even faster. He says, “Yes.”

The boy sits down without being offered the chair, which in this house is an earthquake in a minor key. “The needlewoman. Daphne's — the woman at the house. Prima.”

“Vibia Prima, of Transtiberim. Betrothed to a baker. Nineteen.” Lentulus hears himself delivering a client's particulars and makes his voice change gear, at cost. “Her father, who raised her, is a month buried. Her mother, who raised her, is two years dead. They were decent people in the way that matters.” He is quoting a dead man's tablet. Quoting is what is left when the family runs out of original sentences.

“And the other mother,” Marcus says. It is to his credit — his father notes it with a grief that has pride in it like a stone in a shoe — that he does not make it an accusation. He makes it a request for the record.

“Antonia Cassia was a slave in my father's house. She was seventeen. I was twenty-four, which my family called a mitigating factor and history should call the whole charge sheet. When she was pregnant she was sold south on a morning I was at a muster, by a father settling a marriage — your mother's and mine, Marcus; your existence is minuted in this too, which is not your fault and is now, unavoidably, your information. The child was reported dead. The report was purchased. I asked once whether there was a child, and accepted an answer in statesman's Latin because the Latin was cheaper than the truth. She lived. She sews. She corrected your manners in her mother's dining room before either of you knew why it fitted.”

Marcus is looking at his hands. They are his mother's height and his father's appetite and for once entirely still. “All winter,” he says, “you've — we've — the committee. Her house. You inspected her house at dawn for a province. While my — while she was sewing the border in the next room.”

“Yes.”

“Did you know then?”

“I knew nothing then that I had not taken nineteen years to avoid knowing, which is a worse sentence than the one you asked for, so I will give you the plain one: no. I opened my father's tablet in February. Your mother has known since our first month, and married the settlement anyway, and if you intend to distribute blame in this house you will find the queue forms behind your grandfather and extends through me. It does not reach her."

His mother comes in without knocking because in this house Servilia is the knock: rooms arrange themselves at her approach the way clients arrange their faces, and by the time she is inside the door, time has been made for her. She looks at her husband; at her son, in the junior chair for once, earned by earthquake; and at the scroll-case Lentulus has taken, somewhere in his son's geometry of standing up and sitting down, from the cupboard under his grandfather's cleaned face and set, unopened for the second time in a Lentulus's life, on the side table.

"He has it from the baths," Lentulus says. "In the plumbing's version. Baiae money."

"Then the baths are ahead of my schedule by a day," Servilia says, "and behind my information by nineteen years. Marcus: your face is performing. Either arrange it or spend it. This is a difficult room to be young in; I apologise for the furniture." She does not sit. She has never needed the room's permission for altitude. "Let us be clear in the first hand, since the second is where this family keeps its truths and the third melts quarterly. I knew your father had not come to our marriage as a blank tablet. I did not know a child lived across the river because your grandfather — whose wax is grinning in the corridor as if it had been cleaned for a festival — paid for my ignorance as he paid for almost everything: at a distance, through stewards, in a currency of other people's decades. Do you follow me? I am not the injured discovery in this study, Marcus. I am its management committee."

Marcus looks at her with a young man's first, unscheduled respect, the kind no tutor can issue. "It doesn't reach you," he quotes, because quoting is what is left when a family runs out of original sentences, and because his father said it nine minutes ago and Marcus is trying it for size in the room where it belongs. "The queue for blame."

"It reaches me everywhere," Servilia says calmly, correcting the sentence as a general corrects a map. "Blame is not the department. The department is consequences. Your sister, Marcus." She says the word the way it is currently spent in this house, without additions, as though the singular were still legal tender; the room, taking it, knows exactly how much plural has just been managed. “Cornelia is to sign papers. Among the papers there will be settlements pointing in every decent direction: money to this house, a name to theirs, a roof re-roped, a father standing like a man who has given a daughter and not sold a storm. The Avidii have already surcharged this family for embarrassability — I believe the boy's father used the phrase in figures, which are his poetry — and I will not present them, on the doorstep of the registry office, with a stepsister in a fuller's guild for their cousins to rhyme with.”

“Then Cornelia is to be — not told,” Marcus says. He hears, even as he produces it, the family sentence: a young woman not told, by men who love her in the second column and file her in the first. “Father said: when the telling is for her benefit.”

“Your father,” Servilia says, “is learning a new ledger at an encouraging speed. Cornelia will be told by me, when she has a house of her own with a music room, a husband who pays her master properly, and a copy of every paper with her name in it in a box she can reach. That is not concealment, Marcus. That is timing purchased on behalf of a third party's safety, which is a thing this family is historically illiterate in and is, this season, taking tuition.” She looks at the scroll-case with the expression of a woman pricing furniture at an estate sale. “Will you show him the document?”

Lentulus opens it — not to read, because the tablet has already had that of him in a rainy atrium with nobody improving upon it — and holds it once in the light so that his son can see a dead man's large exact hand and the sentence at the end, which Marcus reads upside down, standing very still, like somebody else's ancestor in a dealer's office. Choose better.

“He had a style at the end,” Marcus says, finding, to his own horror, a laugh that is not a laugh at the end of it. “In a crisis, the Cornelii produce style.”

“Hold your temper with his ghost for the porticoes,” his mother says. “Here he is only the late management. We have the running of the place."

"I wasn't in a queue," Marcus says. "I was at the baths." He stands up, sits down, a young man doing geometry with furniture. "Does Cornelia know?"

"No. Your sister is to be married in the summer into a family that has already surcharged us for embarrassability. She will be told —" Lentulus consults, visibly, the new ledger, the one kept between quarters "— when the telling is for her benefit and not our relief. That distinction is apparently the whole of morality. It has taken this family three hundred years to itemise it, and we owe the wording to a woman on the Caelian."

Marcus laughs once, a sound with no herald before it. "She gives good advice, that woman. Drink your wine slowly, Marcus. I thought she was being a hostess. She was being —" He stops at the word. They both look at it, where it stands in the room like an uninvited client at the morning hour: not mother (not his), not ruin (not anymore), not the woman, that bath-house filing. Something for which his education, expensive and classical, has handed him only the Greek. "She was being kin."

"Kin," Lentulus says. "Yes. It is the word your family has been avoiding at the full rate of eloquence. Learn it cheaper than I did, Marcus. That is the whole of the inheritance I can improve on your grandfather: the wording."

Dinner that night is an exercise in a new household discipline: the saying of everything except one thing, correctly, at length, and with music. Cornelia sings — one song, the Roman, at her father's request and, it is observable to anyone who knows the family's plumbing, at his need, which in this house is a denomination rarely allowed into the dining room undressed. She sings it beautifully. She has begun, since the Acilii, to take the kept-house song at a slower pace, the way a singer on the Caelian slows street tunes until they sound like truth at a funeral; and in the middle verse, where the woman in the poem maintains the household through the war, Cornelia puts in the unlicensed turn her master has given up correcting and Servilia has given up minuting, and Marcus, on his dining couch with a cup he is drinking slowly at a rate that has begun to attract the steward's attention, hears his sister the first sing himself a letter he is currently not writing.

He has written three since the study. They are in his desk under a commentary on sieges, in the place where his younger self kept racing programmes and IOUs.

The first began Vibia Prima and then, appalled by its own courage, spent four lines apologising for knowing the name before announcing, in Greek cadences, that he too was a victim of the Cornelii. He burned it in the brazier Servilia maintains against the household's feelings about cold, watching it go with the knowledge that self-pity, written down, looks remarkably like the family handwriting.

The second began with money. It offered money for everything: for the pyre, for the oven, for the unnameable decades, in sums his father's Greek would have had to launder through two bankers and a small war. He showed it to nobody, because even at twenty, with his education arriving to him nightly like despatches from a province he didn't know he governed, he heard his sister across the river, in his ear's exact memory of a mending room: “I might have been offered the dry one.” A sister is not a catastrophe to be purchased out of. The letter joined the first. The smoke went up the atrium in a manner Onesimus noted and forgot at the highest professional standard.

The third is not finished. It says Prima — not the guild name, not the baths name, the name decreed by a laundress in a ledger he has never seen, whose existence in the world, flat and unprefixed, is the bravest piece of paperwork executed in his family for three centuries. It says he stood at the procession's edge and will not describe it, because grief is not an audience and he is learning, late and at the full rate, which rooms his presence improves. It says he corrected nobody about his sister. It does not yet say which one. The sentence keeps opening inside the letter like a room in a banker's office: smaller truths first, a window in the expensive one. He writes kin in the draft and stares at it in Latin letters, too naked, then in Greek ones, too clothed, then puts the tablet away because dinner and the kept-house song and his father's face at the distribution of the courses are all performing a difficult, joint manoeuvre: a family covering a silence with everything it owns, including, at the last and for the first time on Marcus's watch, an attempt to deserve the silence it is keeping.

“You're not eating,” Cornelia says across the courses, in her new voice for saying things in doorways at full volume.

“I'm ballast,” Marcus says, and gets the reference past the room's inspectors by the skin of its sailing metaphors. “Ballast doesn't eat. It arrives.”

It gets her laugh — once, unissued, the sound she makes now in rooms she does not yet own but has begun to take the dimensions of — and his father, hearing both his documents laugh in two registers at one table, makes a decision in a room with knives in it, where it will not have to be scheduled by anyone: that when the time comes for letters, in this family, to be carried by the right messengers at the right rates, his son's third draft will be a better piece of seamanship than anything in the cupboard, undented mirrors included.

His father finds him the next morning in the garden, in the cold hour when the fish pond is still taking its instructions from the sky and Acilius, lately, has been doing his thinking on tiled floors in other houses.

“I have had the baths quieted,” Lentulus says, with no preamble — it is the new third-column manner, and sounds in his mouth like a difficult language improving. “Not by threat. By settling a dice account of yours before its owner could take it to market as conversation. It appears you then settled the same account in full, in coin, in a garden room.” He looks at the fish making their slow committee under the water's ceiling. “The household reports a surplus of honour. Your mother's office is disoriented. It has had to create a heading.”

“I wanted it to stop being a messenger,” Marcus says. “Money.”

“Money rarely accepts demotion so young.” Lentulus sits down on the bench his father used to fall asleep on between secrets, at an angle that makes room, and Marcus — sitting, uninvited, as if the study's earthquake had permanently changed the house's geology — looks across the pond at the wall his family has been being a name against for three centuries and says the thing that has been queuing in him since the plunge:

“I'm not going to her house. I thought you should have it in the first hand. I have drafts—” He shapes the plural like a man owning a cellar. “I have a third one that doesn't disgrace anybody in it. I'll finish it when it's for her benefit. I think I can now tell the difference between that and my relief, most days, with Onesimus checking my workings from two paces behind.”

His father looks at him then the way a man looks at a column in a courtyard he has lived beside for twenty years on the morning the scaffolding comes down: as though up to now he has been seeing the preparation and mistaking it for the architecture.

“When you do,” Lentulus says, “your mother's Greek will carry it. It has become the household's better hand. Choose better, Marcus.” The words arrive flat, unquoted, at the new rates — not a dead man's style any more, but house money, in circulation. Marcus files them under kin and goes in to breakfast, where Cornelia is prescribing the singer's breakfast to a kitchen that has survived four revolutions of regime already this winter and is prepared, at a word, to survive the Avidii.

The city, for its part, spends the following week trying to invoice him for the information. Hostilius tries again at the races, on a bench where the wind takes men's papers and gives them to gods with a taste for other people's losses; he has refined the story in the interval the way baths water refines a knife. Now it has a young laundress in it who is actually a vestal's niece, and a chair-committee, and an emperor laughing under a marble key.

“You see how it improves with handling,” Hostilius says, delighted. “Like your wine. Four hands and it's a classic.”

“It improves away from the truth,” Marcus says. The horses are running. Down on the sand the colours are doing what fortunes do in every generation: answering to their names in public while being owned elsewhere. “In my father's house we say: the second hand is where the giving happens. Yours is mostly taking.”

Hostilius, who is not a fool — foolishness is an expensive hobby and his is dice — looks at the heir of the Cornelii sideways over the rim of an afternoon and does the arithmetic of careers: a young man who has stopped retailing his household at other people's prices is either ruined or has become, in the third column, somebody. “You sound like a caulker,” he says, and young Avidius, on Marcus's other side, occupied with being ballast in a new installation, remarks to the weather: “It's a rule with menaces. They should arrive at your own prices or be filed as weather.”

Marcus pays Hostilius the dice debt that evening in full, in a garden room, with Onesimus in attendance and a receipt in silver-instead — the first time in their acquaintance that a payment between them has not been partly denominated in secrets. Hostilius counts it with the air of a banker invited, embarrassingly, to a wedding. “To what do I owe the full settlement?”

“To a family system,” Marcus says. “It has spread across the river. Money stops being a messenger and starts being money. Don't let it disorient the benches.”

Onesimus forgets the exchange at the full professional standard the instant it becomes necessary, and on the walk home — the slave two paces behind, occupying the exact back-stage geography he has occupied since Marcus's grandfather was the future — says, out of the plumbing of a house that is re-plumbing itself nightly: “In the old master's time, master Marcus, information in this household was freighted like grain. A lot of it spoiled in transit and nobody dared open the sacks. The young mistress” — he means Cornelia; the corridors have not yet been re-indexed, and Marcus feels the miss of the word in his sternum like a stair trodden wrong — “the young mistress is to have papers in a box. The master has a Greek doing sums at the street door. And now the heir pays a creditor in coin. One hardly knows the address."

"I am learning a word, Onesimus. It has overheads."

"Most of the useful ones do." The old man falls back into his wake with his face doing, at veteran rates, very little indeed. "At Baiae the master once threw a sandal at a steward. I mention it because it cost him the set. He paid, in the end, for a new pair for the household, in a town where they could not be linked to the incident. That was the old management's idea of privacy, sir. New footwear, far away, unwitnessed."

There is no information in it and Marcus knows, with the part of him Onesimus has been quietly educating from two paces behind since he was twelve, that it is a dowry of a kind: an old servant handing the third generation a story with no knives in it, chosen out of a cellar of sharper vintages. He takes it home and puts it, as one does with the household's assays, in the drawer over the unfinished third letter, where it sits for a week of dinners being ballast, of baths being managed, of a committee dissolving in the background of Rome like a cake in rain, until — on an evening when the house is between musical instalments and the spring has finally taken the city the way dye takes linen — he finds himself counting his way after dinner toward a street of olives and sofas, where a doorkeeper's shadow makes a small, governed area in the lamps in which a young man may stand choosing not to come in, at his own rate, with the thread entered separately.

■

He goes to the Caelian that night — the household will report this; households report everything; that is what the plumbing is for — but he does not go in. Barbatus is at the door in his weather of a body, and Marcus, who has swept past Barbatus forty evenings through sheer pedigree, stops on the threshold as at a temple he has not been purified for.

“Is she — Prima. Is she here, working?”

“Young master,” Barbatus says, in the tone he keeps for men deciding, “the mistress's needlewoman keeps guild hours now. Mourning. And the spring work's done at her own table, at her own prices. It's an arrangement the whole street admires.”

“She's to be married.”

“To the baker. Wedding's after the mourning, guild permitting. Good family. Mother like a customs office, which in a baker means the bread's honest weight.”

Marcus stands in the doorway of his father's committee's most famous casualty, a senator's heir with a sister sewing trousseau across the river and a word newly in his pocket with Greek roots and Roman consequences. From inside comes Daphne's voice, doing, for people who know, the Greek song. “Give the house my —” he says. He cannot find a noun small enough to be true. “Tell the mistress a client of the house is learning manners. She'll know the rate.”

“Young master has a face doing the geometry,” Barbatus says, when Marcus has been in the doorway long enough for the street to have filed him as part of the house's evening architecture. “I've seen men work out whether to come into an arena with less of it.”

“I'm not coming in. That is—” Marcus corrects himself, in a doorway, in front of a former gladiator, like a man saying a word in a language he intends to be examined in later. “I'm choosing not to come in. It isn't the same thing and I am collecting the difference, this season, at my own prices.”

“Thread separate,” Barbatus says equably. “Mistress's whole position.” He moves, by the six inches his shadow specialises in, so that a party of eastern merchants can be admitted round Marcus without either the merchants or Marcus having to become, for the door-book, an incident. The house receives them with its full, registered warmth. Inside, cutlery and a navigational conversation argue in another room like a marriage that is going to land its cargo. “Mistress will be told a young master was attending to his manners in the street like a client at a closed office. There's worse in the register. I've entered most of it, in my time. Some of it with swords."

Marcus nearly laughs, and then Daphne's voice comes up through the house's back rooms in the way that trained voices do when the building is the instrument — first the rooms, then the courtyard, then the door, Greek, lower, travelled, for people who'd know — and the laugh dies in him respectably, because a song is arriving that he may no longer use as an entrance. It is a new deprivation for a senator's heir, being auditioned by his own restraint at a doorway he has swept through for a year by sheer pedigree. He finds, standing there in spring dark with a word in his pocket that has Greek roots and Roman consequences, that it is not deprivation. It is ballast. He has been collecting the metaphor ironically all winter; it comes home tonight as cargo, and arrives.

"Tell Daphne —" he says, and hears the whole house correct him in four generations of Eirenes and stewards and women who file kindness as thread. "No. Don't enter Daphne. The mistress only. A client of the house is learning its manners. She'll have the rate for that."

"By the piece," Barbatus agrees. "Master Marcus." The name, in that doorway, delivered without the young in front of it like a small weapon laid down between honourable men, does more for the heir of the Cornelii than any tutorial invoice his family has ever paid. It has been a season of names being called at him correctly at last: by a singer who returned his glass, by a needlewoman who declined his cushion, by a mother who briefed him as an asset, by a doorkeeper with a past that Rome once charged admission for and who now decides, nightly, what constitutes an entrance.

"I'll tell her," Barbatus says, "the vowel sounds and all." And watches him go down the Caelian in the spring dark at a walking pace, which for Marcus, Barbatus reflects, is as close as the young ones get to a religious procession.

He walks home the long way, through streets where the winter is considering retirement and other people's daughters are being counted home by women with lamps. At his own door the slave on duty — not Onesimus, a junior officer of the same diplomatic corps — receives him with the house's current formula, lately amended in committee by his mother, and says only, “Master Marcus is returned,” to nobody in particular, in the tone for provincial appointments. It is entered nowhere. The atrium is quiet; the masks have the house to themselves and the house, for once, to his son. He stands among them in the dark longer than a thanksgiving requires and says, at the volume of a person opening a shutter, the word by itself, to see how it behaves in the room where his family keeps its faces.

“Kin.”

The atrium, being Roman, keeps the remark in the family. It has, after three hundred years, heard worse Latin.

Chapter Nineteen

The Borrowed Spring

. . .

Spring arrives in Rome like a rumour that turns out to be true: almond first, then the markets changing their prices and their smells, then the great column in the Forum rising drum by drum inside its scaffolding, the war spiralling up toward its own statue at a pace even the baths' plumbing can keep up with. Prima works her trousseau at her own table, at her own prices, with a dowry now inscrutably enlarged by a Baiae bequest that the baker's mother has inspected like a hem and pronounced, in the guild parlour, with deep satisfaction, stitched straight. The baker's son — Titus, broad-handed, smelling permanently of warm crust, steady at ladders and pyres — holds whatever she hands him in the way of grief or linen without taking the climb off her, and Prima, who has had a winter of finding out what people are by what they do at doors, treasures the findings in order.

The trousseau occupies the table by stages, like a small province being settled. First come the household linens, plain enough for daily use and exact enough that no one could call them poor; then the finer lengths with borders she has kept for feast days; then the two shifts her mother would have called wasteful if wasteful had ever been a word Claudia used for things intended to last. Prima does not embroider her name where any customs-minded mother-in-law will find it. She works it into a corner seam, letters so small they might be the record of a thread taking thought. What belongs to her should know itself, even if the world is not invited to inspect the evidence.

The guild women inspect everything else. They arrive singly, or in pairs, under pretexts so transparent that nobody bothers to repair them: a borrowed hoop, a question about mordant, a loaf that has taken the wrong shape and must therefore, by some domestic law, be carried across the yard. They handle the cloth with clean thumbs. They praise the evenness of the red. They ask after the bequest with their eyes and after the wedding arrangements with their mouths, and Prima gives both enquiries the same answer—dates, prices, thread—until it becomes clear that appetite will have to feed on something less nourishing than a scandal.

Mother Livia supervises from the position of a woman who has annexed the future by competence. She has firm views on linen and firmer views on men who imagine that marriage entitles them to an opinion about either. “A sheet should know its work,” she says, folding with the brisk violence of a treaty being ratified. “Same as a husband. If it is always announcing itself, it is probably too thin.”

Titus, when his work permits, stands just far enough inside the room not to become another inspector. He mends a broken stool without being asked. He carries water. He submits his own wedding tunic to Prima’s judgement and receives, in return, instructions about a neckline that suggest she has thought carefully about the precise terms on which he is to enter public life beside her. She lets out one seam, takes in another. “You grow broader every time your mother feeds you,” she says.

“That is a serious accusation against the bakery.”

“It is an observation. Stand still.”

He does, with his arms slightly raised and the expression of a man surrendering to a very local government. It is not a grand romantic tableau. No poet passing the door would reach instinctively for a tablet. But there is in it the substance poets usually have to borrow from elsewhere: one person making room for another to be altered without being diminished.

At night she goes through her mother’s leaves again. The mark beneath Kept no longer seems merely unfinished. It has the look, now, of a door deliberately left on the latch. Prima puts a narrow strip of new linen beside the old pages and, after some hesitation, writes the mainspring facts of the season in her own hand: the bequest, the oven share, the commissions paid by the piece, the Thursdays that became Tuesdays because the spring work altered its hours. She does not write the other ledger. Not there. She has learned from two households that truth also needs a suitable room.

The blank with the little mark stays blank. Some sums, she thinks, are not incomplete because nobody knows the answer. They are open because the answer is still being lived.

Outside, the river has lost its winter temper. Barges come down loaded with early greens and timber and gossip from the upper towns. The fullers complain that spring water has its own opinions. A new notice at the guild house advertises work for government cloth, and by noon three men have explained to Prima why she need not trouble herself with the application. By the following noon the clerk has her mark on it. The money has not made her loud. It has made refusal more expensive for other people, which in Rome is the practical form of liberty.

She goes to the Caelian on Tuesdays. Not as staff; the door-book, Diomedes has seen to it, now holds a category for tradeswomen related by commission, a formula of such elastic dullness that no aedile will ever measure it. They work. Sometimes they do not work and walk in the courtyard among the overwatered roses while Eirene practises, loudly, being elsewhere. Antonia tells it in pieces now, not evenings: her mother's hands in other women's hair; Baiae stairs by the counted dozen; the Naples widow whose will did the work of angels out of spite at a son-in-law; the first dining room, two tables and a lamp-seller's credit; the pastry cook's arrival, which Prima already knows by the evidence of his saffron disputes. Prima tells it back, her order: the vats, the counting, the thumbprint of the river goddess, the father who held a rail and joked. Between the two versions, on the courtyard stones, a family is being attempted the way the fullers attempt a stained garment: slowly, without rushing the soak, in water changed as often as honesty requires.

The Tuesdays acquire rules without either woman proposing them as a constitution. Prima arrives after the guild’s morning work, never with an escort beyond the crossing, always with something in her hands.

Antonia is never discovered waiting in the courtyard, which would make hunger too visible; she is discovered at accounts, or issuing instructions about cushions, or standing over Ammonius while he performs a private civil war against a sauce. Then Business occurs first. Border counts, damaged corners, cloth that has taken dye unevenly and must be made presentable without lying too flagrantly.

Only when the invoice has established their public relationship do the other subjects approach, usually carrying food.

It is astonishing how much biography can be got through in the interstices of soup. Antonia speaks of Naples not as a single revelation but as weather, rent, a landlady who counted spoons and a widow who counted everybody. She explains the first loans to women: small sums, no sermons attached, interest stated plainly enough that gratitude was not required to do arithmetic in the dark. “A woman came to me for money to redeem her tools from her brother-in-law,” she says. “She paid it back in dyed wool and gossip. Both were excellent quality. Her brother-in-law believes to this day that a priest intervened.”

Prima tells her about the vat work before her hands were trusted with fine cloth: the sour air, the women singing to keep the rhythm, Claudia arriving among them with her leaves and turning other people’s disasters into columns they could stand upright in. She tells how her father once tried to teach her the names of stars from the roof and gave up in favour of teaching her which guild officials could be trusted after wine. “He said stars were more regular but less useful in a dispute.”

Sometimes there is silence, which Antonia still finds harder than narrative. Narrative can be shaped. Silence belongs to both parties equally, and therefore keeps escaping government. On the second Tuesday, Prima sits with a torn length untouched in her lap for the whole time it takes the courtyard fountain to be argued over by two slaves and a plumber. Antonia does not ask what she is thinking. It costs her approximately the price of a small villa, but she does not ask.

At last Prima says, “I keep expecting to feel that something has been given back.”

“And instead?”

“Something has been added. It is heavier. Not worse. Heavier.” She turns the cloth over, though there is nothing yet to inspect. “At home, if I said that, someone would tell me to eat.”

“In this house that is also policy. Eirene regards introspection as a symptom of an empty bowl.”

“Then I can tell you the rest after lentils.”

The rest is not dramatic. That, Antonia begins to understand, may be the form mercy takes when it is not trying to appear in a tragedy. Prima is angry on some Tuesdays, briefly and without aim, like weather caught between roofs. She is curious on others. Once she asks whether Antonia had imagined her at particular ages. Antonia, who has spent twenty years training herself not to manufacture ghosts wholesale, answers with dangerous honesty: “No. I thought if I imagined you too precisely I would begin grieving a person I had invented, and that seemed another theft. I kept the facts I had been sold and paid rent on them.”

Prima considers this with her needle suspended. “My mother did the imagining forwards. She used to plan what I would need at twenty when I was nine. Gloves. A second box. A way of saying no that wouldn’t cost a customer.”

“Did she teach you that?”

“She tried. I am still in the class.”

On the fourth Tuesday, rain shuts them into the linen room with a whole afternoon of grey light. Prima takes from her work-box the strip of new writing and, without ceremony, shows Antonia the accounts of oven and bequest and commissions. The columns are Claudia’s and not Claudia’s. The hand is firmer. At the foot of the page, under a heading of her own, she has entered: Visits paid by the piece. Thread separate.

Antonia looks at it for too long to pass as a customer.

“Is the wording wrong?” Prima asks.

“The wording,” Antonia says, “is alarmingly sound.”

“I thought if anyone finds it after I am dead, they should know I was not being kept in secret at luxury prices.”

“They will also know you inherited a suspicious mind.”

“I had excellent teachers on both banks.”

That day she stays until Barbatus is lighting the lamps. At the door she pauses with the roll of work against her shoulder and says, in the same tone she uses for an estimate that may change when the cloth is unrolled at home, “I am glad you told me indoors.” Then she goes out into the wet street before gratitude can become a debt either of them has to administer.

“Does Daphne know?” Prima asks, stitching. “She looks at me now like someone reading under the line.”

“Daphne suspects an entire library. She has the singer's disease: she believes every room has a song under it. I have told her that I pay you over the rate because you are the best needlewoman in Rome. It has the virtue, in this city, of being nearly true.”

“And Marcus.” It is not quite a question. The needle goes in, comes out. “Barbatus says he came to the door and stood there like weather.”

“Marcus is learning manners at the full rate. His family does nothing by instalments except debts.” Antonia watches the border grow: red flowers, spring issue. “He will write to you, eventually. It will be a terrible letter, full of Greek, and entirely sincere. Keep it with your tools. A woman should have evidence of what men cost in their own handwriting.”

Daphne’s knowledge, insofar as the house can map it, advances by the method of all gifted listeners: she notices where the music has been altered. Barbatus no longer announces Prima in the tradeswoman’s formula he uses for the chair-menders and lamp men. Eirene has begun to ask whether soup is needed for Tuesday, as if a day of the week had acquired a pulse. Diomedes, whose face in an emergency could be filed as blank stationery, has invented a door-book category so boring that its very dullness shines.

Daphne says nothing. This, in Daphne, is not discretion so much as rehearsal.

She begins to leave fruit where Prima will find it. Not at the table—too public, too near contract. On the windowsill of the linen room: two early plums, a small bunch of grapes out of season and therefore scandalously eloquent. Prima eats one plum and leaves the other, divided into exact halves on a clean square of cloth. Rome is full of languages spoken by women who are not supposed to have anything to say to each other except through men.

One afternoon, when rain has emptied the courtyard, Daphne finds Prima washing dye from her hands at the basin. “You have her way of listening,” Daphne says. “As if a mistake may drop something valuable.”

“Whose way?”

“Now you have her way of answering too.” Daphne examines her own nails, which have survived the winter better than her illusions. “I don’t require the score. I sing in this house; I am not its treasury. But if you ever need someone to not know something at Marcus, I have become very accomplished.”

Prima dries her hands carefully, finger by finger. “Did you like him?”

“I liked being looked at by a future that hadn’t yet learned its price.” The answer is too polished, and Daphne knows it; a brief, less musical honesty alters her face. “Yes. Sometimes. That is exactly why the necklace went home. If it had meant nothing, I could have kept it.”

It is the first confidence offered to Prima at the Caelian house that has not arrived via Antonia, and it changes the room’s weights. Prima does not reciprocate with the vault. She says instead, “My betrothed once brought me hot bread in the rain and tried to pretend he had been passing the street on other business. Four ovens, no other business.”

Daphne laughs, startled into her speaking voice. “Did you accept the fiction?”

“I accepted the bread. The fiction is still under review.”

After that, the fruit exchange becomes regular and unspoken, like any sound treaty. Antonia observes it and says nothing to either woman.

She has paid enough for the lesson that kinship, once discovered, does not report to a single office.

Marcus remains the more theoretical relative. Prima had seen him through a doorway as a young man made of assumptions and expensive cloth. Now he occupies a category no guild register provides. She tries out the word brother while counting and drops three stitches. She tries the senator's son and produces a border so regular it looks machine-made. She settles temporarily on Marcus, a name with no instructions attached.

"What if he writes badly?" she asks.

"He will."

"What if he writes well?"

"That will be more troublesome. We shall have to believe him."

"And if I don't answer?"

Antonia is testing a cushion seam and does not look up too quickly. "Then you will not answer. It is a reply in every office except his family's, which is learning."

Prima nods, but the needle pauses. Freedom, when other people describe it on your behalf, can sound suspiciously like another arrangement. She has begun to notice how often her choices are being pre-approved by people eager to prove that they are not arranging her. "I might answer."

"You might."

"I might ask him a question."

"You might ask him several. The Cornelii prefer questions in committee, but he is showing signs of independent governance."

"What would I ask?"

This time Antonia's restraint is more expensive. There are questions she has wanted put to that house for twenty years, elegantly sharpened questions, questions with subclauses. She leaves them all in their drawer. "That would be yours," she says. "Not mine in your handwriting."

Prima takes a new length of red wool and begins the next flower. “I would ask what he was told to call my father.”

Outside, Barbatus tells somebody to move a mule in a voice that suggests the mule is the reasonable party. The courtyard fills with ordinary racket. Antonia looks down at her own imperfect seam and understands, again, that entrusting the girl with the truth includes not renting her out as the courier of other people’s unfinished business.

Prima laughs, and Antonia hears — files it, with Diomedes exactitude, in the third book, the real one — the sound her own laugh made at seventeen, before it was trained, in a house on the Quirinal, over a line about a loom. It does not undo her. It has, if anything, the opposite effect; the sound arrives like a sum coming right at the second count. She gets up to be about the house's business before her face can make an entry the tax office could audit.

The spring work nevertheless has its own emergencies, indifferent to the emotional reorganisation of two families. A consignment of cloth arrives from the south with one bolt cut short and another carrying a stain so shapely it looks intentional, which is worse. The merchant’s agent maintains, in the courtyard, that both defects are features of the weaving district and possibly marks of authenticity. Diomedes receives this theory with a face wiped clean for the occasion. Eirene suggests, helpfully, that authenticity may also be authenticated by returning the money. Antonia is upstairs being informed that a newly rich customer expects his entire dining room to suggest naval victory without being so vulgar as to mention ships.

Prima has already taken the cloth to the linen-room table.

“The stain will come out if we do not frighten it,” she says. “The short bolt can make the inner curtains. Use the good lengths outside. Nobody at dinner inspects the layer nearest the wall unless the conversation is so poor that honesty would be kinder anyway.”

Diomedes looks at her with the restrained joy of a strategist discovering an ally in an unexpected province. “And the agent?”

“Pay for what arrived. Not for what he intended to send. Intentions can be stored at his warehouse free of charge.”

It is entered. The agent departs with less money and a story about the Caelian house that will become, in his own mouth, a testimonial to his influence there. Antonia returns in time to see Prima marking the temporary border in chalk, sleeves pushed up, a tradeswoman wholly in command of an emergency in somebody else’s expensive house.

“You might have called me,” Antonia says.

“I did. You were dressing a room for a naval victory with no ships.”

“It is to suggest oars.”

“Then the curtains are ahead.”

There is something in the exchange that belongs neither to the invoice nor to the confession. Antonia feels it arrive and, instead of seizing it by the shoulders to ask what it is called, takes up the scissors Prima has put down and holds them when asked. Later she will not know which of them first reached for the cloth marker, only that both hands found it at once and withdrew without apology.

Work has this mercy: it sometimes allows people to rehearse kinship as competence before they are obliged to perform it as feeling.

At the end of that Tuesday, Prima asks whether she may take one of the damaged offcuts for her own household. It is not valuable. It is hardly cloth, except in the eyes of women raised to correct the waste of other people’s worlds. Antonia says yes too quickly, then corrects herself into ordinary language. “Put it on your invoice at discard price. Diomedes faints if goods levitate.”

“What does he do if they are merely carried across a river by their purchaser?”

“He recovers at professional speed.”

Prima rolls the offcut with the spring linen. “I shall make cushion covers. Titus’s mother says cushions are how a house makes promises it may not keep. She has eleven.”

“Tell Mother Livia their seam will know its work.”

“She will inspect the saying.”

Barbatus, on door duty, watches her out with the look of a man seeing a recruit leave on leave with proper boots. In the street, Rome is all wet stone and roast chestnuts and the first swallows stitching black thread across the dusk. Prima crosses home by the island and, for no reason a ledger can recognise, stops at the middle of the bridge.

The river is doing what rivers do in family stories, which is refuse to carry symbolism at a fixed rate. Barges knock gently against piles. A boy is fishing with the confidence of ignorance. On one bank are the vats and ovens and the house where she has become herself. On the other, lanterns are being lit in streets that lead eventually to a courtyard where another becoming is being attempted, late and under business hours.

She shifts the bundle on her shoulder and continues toward home. It is, all right, heavier. It is also hers to carry.

■

At the Palatine house, spring is a calendar of bridal administration. The Avidian match is concluded — allied, the families will say until they die — and Servilia goes through the ceremonies of it as through a province she intends to leave better governed than she found it: the contract, the auspices, the staggering, priced choreography of two houses becoming one and pretending it is a festival rather than a merger. Cornelia assists with the dreamy competence of a girl who has decided, privately and against all the songs, that she will keep some part of the house inside herself unregistered. She has taken, that spring, to singing the Greek one for her music master — who has been paid better, by Avidius in advance, and no longer needs to touch anyone's wrist for any reason.

The marriage papers generate their own subsidiary marriages: between families and accountants, between ancestral pride and shipping schedules, between the bride’s musical education and a father-in-law who regards every recurring expense as a vessel requiring inspection before launch. Servilia sits at the centre of it all with three clerks, two alternative versions of the property schedule, and the calm of a general who has inherited a battlefield already mapped by men who assumed the women would walk around it.

Cornelia is required to be present for portions of the proceedings and decorative for others. She distinguishes the two with dangerous accuracy. When the question of her personal slaves arises, she interrupts a fluent exchange between stewards to state that her maid will accompany her, that the old nurse will be pensioned rather than transferred like a chair, and that nobody is to sell her music master's replacement out of the household accounts in her name without asking her. The clerks look toward Servilia for instructions. Servilia looks at her daughter and says, "Enter it."

It is not rebellion. Rome would have a word for rebellion and a flute-girl waiting outside court to illustrate it. It is something quieter and harder to vaccinate against: a young woman discovering that a contract, if read carefully, contains surfaces on which a hand may rest.

Avidius the younger visits under the usual diplomatic constraints. He brings, after consultation with his father and, one suspects, several maritime deities, not jewellery but a schedule of the house he is preparing: which rooms catch morning light, where a music room might be made without disturbing the stores, whether the roof can bear the modification his mother insists is traditional. He lays the plan before Cornelia as if it were cargo for inspection.

"You need not look so surprised," he says. "I was told you ask questions."

"By whom?"

"By a person who said it as a warning and another who said it as praise. I chose the more economical interpretation."

Cornelia studies the plan. "This room will be dark after noon."

"Yes."

"Then it should not be mine."

Avidius leans over, pencil in hand. "This one is larger, but my mother says the floor complains."

“All floors complain. It is how they participate.” She says it deadpan, and watches him fail to decide whether she is joking. He laughs a fraction late, which is better than the prompt, well-trained laughter of young men who have been told their bride is accomplished.

Servilia observes from the third chair, her face performing genealogy. She has not procured love; even her powers have provincial boundaries. She may have procured the conditions under which respect does not have to be smuggled.

Later, alone with her mother among the dress lengths, Cornelia asks why everyone has been behaving as though the house contained an expensive silence.

“Every house does,” Servilia says. “Ours has recently improved its manners.”

“Is it about Father and the committee?”

“It is about money, family, and the difference between the two.”

“That is not an answer.”

“No. It is a direction.” Servilia takes the girl’s wrist, not to correct it, and turns the hand palm-up as she might inspect a glove for fit. There is no pale mark there, no household legend. “One day you will be told a thing which was kept from you for reasons partly good and partly ours. When it happens, remember that I said partly. It is a more useful inheritance than rage.”

Cornelia looks at their joined hands. “That is ominous.”

“It is Roman. We put our omens indoors and give them dinner.”

“I shall put it with the other things nobody explains until after the contract.”

“Put it at the front of that box.”

The girl goes back to the fabrics, choosing not the richest but the one with a colour that deepens in low light. Her mother watches the choice with an approval she does not cheapen by explanation. There is more of the household in the girl than gloom predicts. That is perhaps what households are for: to surprise the management without overthrowing it altogether.

On the day the contract is signed, Avidius the father lingers in Lentulus's study over Falernian that predates both their ambitions. “Your committee did you no favours in the east,” he says, harbour-fashion, stating the tide. “I lose a governor for a son-in-law's father. I gain a senator with clean hands and a new registry with his name on the clause my ships' chaplains are already quoting at the crews, may the gods restrain their enthusiasm. Overall —” the great evaluator's shrug “— I call it cargo landed. Not the manifest we filed. Landed.”

“You,” Lentulus says, “are the first man to tell me that this year in that tone.”

“I unload grain. Tides waste more fortunes than storms, senator, by arriving slightly not as promised.” Avidius sets down his cup precisely in its predecessor's ring, a dockside man made good performing, perfectly, the oldest rite of the house he is marrying into. “We need not discuss the Caelian ever again in this room, I think. My son eats there less than he did, your son stands in its doorway like a penitent, and the woman who runs it has just renewed her wine contract with my partner at a price that suggests she knew the vintage before the grapes did. Rome, eh? The accounts all settle, one way or another. The only choice we get is the currency.”

Lentulus looks at him for a long moment, this former unloader who has just quoted his own dead father's final advice back to him without knowing a letter of it, and experiences a sensation his family has historically confused with indigestion: kinship, upstream, where no committee has jurisdiction. “To landed cargo,” he says, and they drink, two old Romans of entirely different manufacture, in a study full of paper.

Before Avidius takes his leave, he asks, with the abruptness of a man who believes a hull should be knocked to hear where it rings false, whether Lentulus regrets the province.

It is not a question members of Lentulus’s order ask one another except in the forms of condolence, where the answer has been upholstered in advance. Lentulus looks toward the corridor, where the ancestors are presumably waiting for him to produce three centuries of the correct emotion. “I regret a number of arrangements,” he says. “The province has joined an old queue.”

“That is not what your friends say.”

“My friends are distinguished men. They regard ambiguity as a provincial product.”

Avidius turns his cup slowly. “At Ostia, when a ship misses its weather, there are captains who spend the whole season explaining the wind. Others unload, repair what can be repaired, and find a cargo that was never in the first manifest. Both kinds call themselves realists.”

“And which am I, in your harbour taxonomy?”

“Too early to enter it. But you have stopped hiring men to insult the wind in committee.” The older man’s eyes have a dockworker’s flat kindness: no shine provided unless earned. “Your name will travel. Names do. See it is not only travelling in other people’s mouths.”

It is superb advice and wholly unusable, which may be why Lentulus accepts it without the usual citizenship papers. “You speak,” he says, “like a man whose son learned ballast from the cradle.”

“He learned invoices. Ballast came later and cost more.”

When Avidius has gone, Lentulus remains in the study with the signed copy of the marriage contract and the little dented mirror. The mirror gives him back a face assembled from family and weather, no more exonerated than it was in January but less interested in petitioning for the status. He has begun to keep, in a private notebook too plain for a senator, a list not of debts—the Greek manages those at a level beneath poetry—but of persons to whom precision is owed. The wording changed weekly at first. It has settled.

Onesimus enters with the hour’s correspondence. There is a dinner invitation from a man who avoided him in February and has now remembered an ancestral intimacy. There is a request for patronage. There is a memorandum from the east, where other men’s ambitions are becoming geography. Lentulus sets the eastern paper beneath the others. “Anything from the Caelian?” he asks, and hears the impropriety too late. There is not supposed to be anything from the Caelian. Correspondence would imply a relationship the settlement carefully excludes.

“Nothing requiring the house, sir.”

The formulation is perfect, and therefore Onesimus. Lentulus nods. It occurs to him that he is being governed by a series of absences, all of them more competent than his former methods. No message where a message would make demands. No appearance at doors. Money where money can be inspected and called something dull. A son learning silence as though it were a new instrument. A daughter receiving a house plan from a young man who has discovered that pencil marks are safer than passions. A wife conducting the entire reorganisation under the heading of a wedding.

He writes in the plain notebook, under no name: Do not make repair into another claim.

The sentence pleases him, which makes him suspicious of it. He crosses out repair and writes accuracy. This pleases him less and is therefore allowed to remain.

From the music room comes Cornelia’s voice running up a scale, pausing, beginning again at the place where she has decided her breath should belong to her. It is spring. In the Forum the column is rising under its scaffolds, telling the official story in a continuous spiral no passer-by can read from the ground. In the study of an unsuccessful candidate for the east, more modest narratives are being revised at eye level, where they may actually be some use.

That evening the Palatine house dines privately, which in a great family still means a room containing enough ancestry to complicate digestion. The wedding contract lies safely in its case. Nobody has to be charming in the direction of a harbour. Cornelia, taking advantage of the absence of guests, eats with the direct attention of a young woman who has spent the day being a diplomatic asset and is now off duty as a continent.

“Is being allied tiring?” Marcus asks her.

“It is mostly fittings,” she says. “Documents for cloth, cloth for documents. I have been measured spiritually by three aunts.”

“Did you pass?”

“I pleaded floorboards.” It is a private joke whose provenance Marcus does not know, and Cornelia, delighted to possess information her brother cannot access, refuses to develop it. Some power at last has been distributed evenly.

Servilia asks after the music room proposed on the Avidian plan. Cornelia repeats, with improvements, the matter of the complaining floor. Her father listens as if a dispatch had arrived from a province he would rather have been sent to. “A room that complains,” he says, “lets you know where you stand.”

“Father,” Cornelia says, “that was almost a saying.”

“Withdrawn. The family has a surplus.”

Marcus drinks slowly, a habit now so entrenched that the cupbearer has ceased to hover. He watches his sister occupy her place at the table—this sister, the declared and documented one, whose impending marriage is the cover under which the household is performing several less discussable operations—and feels gratitude sharpen, dangerously, into guilt. He puts the cup down. Guilt is a form of weather, his mother would say; do not let it appoint itself captain.

“You will sing at the wedding?” he asks.

“Not on the programme. Brides are not supposed to provide the entertainment at their own alliance. It confuses the invoices.”

“But afterwards.”

“Afterwards I shall have a room with a floor that participates.” She looks at her father. “And a master who is paid properly. It is in the schedule. Mother entered it.”

Servilia says, “I enter many things. It relieves conversation.”

It is not a scene of revelation. No mask falls from the wall and confesses. But when Cornelia rises to practise, Lentulus finds himself listening not for the perfection he used to value, the polished presentation of a house achieving what it was bred for, but for the slight alterations—breath taken where she chooses, pace loosened, the second attempt at a phrase after an error. Getting something right at the second count. His family, which has historically preferred to make the first count illegal, is having to learn the music from elsewhere.

Chapter Twenty

The Clause

. . .

The registry passes into the city's habits the way weather does: complained about, evaded at the margins, priced into everything by the second quarter. Antonia files her house — the upright hand, the fees on the day, the women's legal conditions entered like a roll of honour, which in the book's intention they are — and discovers, as she has discovered every regulation aimed at her survival since Baiae, that compliance, pursued to the point of theatre, is the best camouflage a working house can wear. The aediles' inspector returns in the spring quarter, by appointment now, and is given the pastry cook's almond cakes as a matter of administrative routine. He measures no doorway. He asks after the new stove. Rome has decided that the house on the Caelian is an institution, and Rome protects its institutions with the same energy it denies its people: totally, and without apology.

The filing itself takes a whole morning and two excursions of Diomedes into official weather. The registry office has acquired what new Roman institutions acquire before wisdom: a queue, a smell of damp cedar, and three clerks whose understandings of the same form differ sufficiently to constitute a mystery religion. Diomedes arrives with duplicate rolls, triplicate patience and a household schedule so neatly ordered that the chief clerk looks faintly disappointed, as though propriety had deprived him of sport.

He is a freedman himself, this clerk, with ink permanently in the second knuckle of his right hand. He reads the women's conditions not as a prurient but as a man testing a bridge before traffic. Names, status, fees retained, rights of departure, savings held where, by whom, under what seal. At one point he taps the clause at the foot of Antonia's house rules. "You cite it before the courts have settled its width."

“Madam likes a door measured before someone else brings a ram,” Diomedes says.

“It may be distinguished into a thread.”

“Threads are also entered separately.”

The clerk looks up. For an instant the office contains neither queue nor cedar nor the great republic of euphemism, only two men who have made lives out of other people’s documents. He stamps the roll. “Then let the record show a thread where it can be found.”

At the Caelian, compliance is staged with the luxury of a house that intends to make inspection boring. The strongbox schedule is not shown—some rooms, as the Greek has taught everyone, must remain smaller truths—but copies exist in hands that can appear at an office before rumour has finished putting on its sandals. Barbatus is instructed which visitors constitute patrons for the doorway measurements and which are merely weather in boots. The women are briefed by Eirene in the courtyard, with bread, on what an inspector may ask and what he may be told to find in the roll.

“Are we to say we are happy?” asks one of the newer girls, who is not a girl in any but the city’s lazy vocabulary and has a singing voice with an adult’s judgement already installed.

“You are to say what is in your contract,” Eirene replies. “Happiness is not a taxable condition. If he wants a poem, he can pay Daphne.”

The inspector arrives in spring by appointment, a development which strikes him, visibly, as a decline in the romance of office. He is younger than in winter, or daylight is less forgiving to the fiction of experience. He checks the tax receipts. He looks at the new stove with the reverence of a man whose own kitchen remains a scene of marital negotiations. He asks whether the price of almonds is really what his wife claims and receives a briefing from Ammonius so complete that forms are signed as an act of escape.

In passing the small dining room, he hears rehearsal: Daphne, one phrase, over and over, each repetition less decorated than the last. He pauses. “Greek?”

“Music,” Diomedes says.

The state, having been given cakes, accurate figures and a door held by a former gladiator who could fold its representative into a petition, departs reassured. Rome is good at this form of transcendence. If a thing is entered in enough books, it ceases to be scandal and becomes urban furniture.

Antonia watches him go from the upper landing. She does not exult. Exultation is for people who believe offices stay bought. She has only made the house legible on terms she helped choose. Legibility is not safety. It is a better kind of exposure.

What Rome has not entirely decided is what to do with the clause. No house to profit by a person whose refusal has no legal existence. It was drafted, if the city only knew it, at dawn by a barber's client in a sentence — the single fully honest sentence, Antonia privately believes, of Lentulus's public career — and it passes through the courts that spring and summer like a coin through a market: cited by an advocate here, distinguished (that advocate’s word for buried standing up) by a praetor there, ending up, as such coin does, in the purse of a freedwoman of the Subura who uses it, in September, to walk out of a lodging house near the Carinae on its proprietor, a man who had held her manumission money — against breakages, as his paperwork put it — for six years. She walks out with her papers, her savings and a copy of the clause made by a scribe who charges her half, the revolution coming as it does in Rome not with trumpets but with discounts.

The first advocate to make serious money out of the clause does so by losing with it beautifully. His client is not romantic material for law students: a middle-aged bath attendant who claims that his former owner has kept back the savings accumulated toward his freedom after freedom itself had been granted in a will. The praetor distinguishes, narrows and, in the great legal style, applauds the principle while declining to let it interfere with lunch. Still, the phrase enters circulation. Men begin to quote it in porticoes with the inaccurate confidence of people fresh from hearing a song once.

A copyist near the Basilica starts selling a neat extract: the clause, three lines of commentary and a warning that commentary is not counsel. The warning costs extra. Students buy it. A freedwoman who sells ribbons buys it and has it read to her by her brother. A lodging-house keeper buys it to discover whether it can be made to mean the opposite and comes away disappointed in both law and punctuation.

The woman near the Carinae is called Saufeia—no, Saufia in her own pronunciation, which the documents repeatedly overrule. She has worked six years in rooms let by the man who once bought her freedom as an investment and then developed a proprietary interest in defining what freedom might reasonably require. Her savings remain in his chest against breakages. There have been no breakages. There have been deductions for towels, for lamp oil, for a cracked basin owned jointly by fate and the house. What begins as a dispute over money becomes, when she tries to take other work, a dispute over whether her refusal to remain has any civic substance beyond a noise a creditor can choose to hear.

She goes first to a patron's clerk, who advises patience as men advise weather to a roof. Then to a scribe, who copies the clause at half price because his sister once worked in a house where accounts were kept for women in the way traps are dug for deer. Then to a young advocate with more appetite than clients. He reads the clause aloud, slowly, in front of the lodging-house door, with two witnesses he has borrowed from a bread queue.

The proprietor says, "She owes."

"Itemise," says the advocate, who has discovered the revolutionary power of asking men to put their habits into columns.

There is an hour of it, at street level, without swords. A towel that was already torn. Oil consumed in the course of business. A basin whose crack predates the reign. Neighbours gather with the moral seriousness Romans bring to any entertainment not requiring a ticket. The chest is opened because not opening it has become more expensive in reputation. Saufia's papers come out. Her savings come out, diminished but no longer metaphysical.

She does not process in triumph. She ties her bundle twice because her hands are shaking and asks the bread-queue witnesses whether one of them will walk with her as far as her cousin's street. Only afterward, in baths and bakeries and the coppery afterlife of a story improving by handling, does the paper become a torch. The reality is less flammable and more useful: a woman crosses a threshold carrying her own documents, and a man behind her discovers that the word breakages has lost its magic because other people have read it in daylight.

By September, three other cases have cited the clause, two successfully and one into a dignified provincial burial. The law has not remade Rome. It has put a handle on one side of a door. In a city built by men who specialise in walls, handles are not a small technology.

Daphne hears the story at the baths and tells it in the small dining room with a singer's instinct for the final note. "She walked past him, they say, holding the paper like a torch."

"Paper burns," Antonia says. "That is why we also keep the Greek." — meaning the banker, meaning the copies, meaning Diomedes three hands, meaning everything she has learned about survival being a filing system with a soul. She looks at Daphne, who is twenty-two and free three years and holding, these days, real stones of modest size purchased with her own fees and kept, by house advice, in the Greek's strongbox against a bad winter. "Your contract here comes up at the new year."

"I know the date. Singers count bars."

"Renew it at the new rate, with the clause cited in your own hand at the foot." Antonia pushes across a tablet on which Diomedes — who has aged, this year, a full decade in the eyes, as people do who keep other people's centuries in thread drawers — has written the terms in the hand reserved for things that must look boring to survive. "Every woman in this house. One by one. If Rome is going to register us, it will register that in this house first."

Daphne reads. The room is quiet. The house beyond performs its evening overture: water, linen, the pastry cook whose saffron has this week been vindicated by two separate Alexandrians. “He wrote this,” Daphne says finally. “The senator. In the committee that was supposed to close us.”

“He wrote a sentence. What it closes and opens is our business.” Antonia stands; the evening requires her in three rooms at once and she will accomplish it, as ever, by being fully in one at a time and letting the house's memory do the rest. “Sing the Greek tonight, Daphne. For people who know. I am told there are more of them every quarter.”

The renewals happen over six weeks, because nothing intended to be real at the Caelian house is ever done in a single evening for effect. Diomedes prepares each tablet separately. Eirene sits in, not as chaperone—the word would make her spit into an expensive rug—but as a witness whose memory has jurisdiction in places courts do not reach. The Greek, or one of his terrifyingly polite subordinates, attends when savings are discussed, bringing with him the odour of cedar and the implication that numbers can be made to stand in a room without apologising.

Some women sign at once. Some take the tablet away overnight and return with questions in hands that have clearly consulted sisters, lovers, bathhouse philosophers or the small hours. One asks whether the right of departure includes departure in anger. Antonia says it includes departure in weather, provided the fees for work already promised are settled as the contract states. “I am not purchasing your gratitude,” she says. “I have enough furniture.”

Another, a dancer with an actor’s superstition about written promises, wants the clause read by someone not paid by the house. Diomedes makes no face. He sends for the registry clerk on his free afternoon and pays him an interpretation fee which is entered, with scrupulous deadpan, under Educational. The clerk reads. He explains the difference between a legal phrase and a key: one can be carried without fitting every lock. The dancer listens with her chin in her hand.

“And if the lock wins?” she asks.

“Then the fact that you have a copy proves somebody thought you might have the right to try the door,” says the clerk. “It is not nothing. In my office, nothing has a whole archive.”

She signs.

There is also the question of jewels. Antonia has never allowed the house to hold gifts as informal hostages, but other customs die more slowly than rules. Necklaces are produced from drawers, from the Greek’s office, from secret linings and one memorable pot of face powder. Each is entered as the property of its owner, with any stones valued and storage chosen. The exercise produces the atmosphere of an audit at a temple and two confessions about men whose names improve by being omitted.

“Mine came from a Syrian who believed garnets prevented seasickness,” says one woman. “I have never been on a ship.”

“Prevention,” Eirene says, “proven.”

Daphne is present for more of these sessions than her own contract requires. At first Antonia thinks it is curiosity. Then she sees the singer explaining, in simpler language, the difference between money held for a woman and money held from her. She has the born advocate’s talent for giving a hard sentence a human pulse. She no longer performs every feeling as if an audience were paying by the shiver; some expressions she now says in her speaking voice.

Near the end of the six weeks, the youngest of the musicians—twenty, ambitious, and not yet resigned to the fact that talent ages more slowly than skin—asks Antonia directly: “Did you wish someone had done this for you?”

The room becomes very interested in its lamps.

Antonia might make a house policy of the moment. She might make a tragedy. Instead she puts her hand flat on the table, a gesture whose meaning has changed over the year from testing for damp to keeping things from being swept away. “I wished for a copy of anything I had supposedly agreed to,” she says. “That was the first form of it. Grandeur came later and cost more.”

The musician signs her renewal and then, shyly, initials an additional line acknowledging receipt of her own savings statement. It is the least poetic act in the house that month, and Eirene, who has buried three musical careers and assisted at the birth of several bank accounts, regards it as one might a civic monument.

Later Antonia finds the Educational fee in Diomedes ledgers and approves it. “We are becoming an institution.”

“With curriculum,” Diomedes says. “Rome will have us on a plinth by winter if the accounts maintain their morals.”

“Let it begin at floor level. Plinths are hard to sweep.”

Saufia comes to the Caelian once, in October, not for sanctuary and not for work. She comes because a bath attendant who knows a pastry cook who knows Eirene has told her there is a house where a woman can have a document read without a man first explaining why it says less than she thinks.

She arrives at the trades entrance with her papers tied in blue thread and her manner prepared for an argument. Barbatus, who has a sixth sense for persons expecting to be charged for air, takes her first to the courtyard and then, on Eirene’s instruction, to soup. The papers come out only after the bowl is empty.

Diomedes reads by daylight, aloud, at reading speed rather than official speed. He does not improve the sums. Saufia points with one finger whenever a word appears to be doing more work than its size justifies. “There,” she says, at patronal. “He used it as if it were a lock and a roof and an opinion.”

“It means the office of a former owner toward a freed person,” Diomedes says.

“I know what it means. I want to know when it stops meaning he keeps the key.”

It is an excellent question, and the linen room receives it as one receives an expert in any trade. Antonia, passing with a list for glassware, stops in the doorway but does not enter. This is not her interview. Office by office, the house is learning to keep its benefactions from becoming a new venue for dependence.

Daphne waits until the reading is over and then says, from across the room where she is mending the strap of her own sandal with unnecessary artistry, “Did you really hold the paper like a torch?”

Saufia looks down at the roll. “I held it so the ink wouldn’t spoil. It had rained.”

“The baths have upgraded you.”

“Tell them not to. Torches go out.”

It is the best critique the clause receives in Rome that quarter.

She leaves with a fair copy, a narrower but more realistic understanding of her former owner’s claims, and no money from Antonia. She has not asked for money. Eirene has put bread in her bundle, because human government must be allowed its loopholes. At the door she turns back—not to Antonia, who is in another room, but to the house at large. “You register all this?” she asks Diomedes.

“Those parts the city can be trusted to pronounce.”

“Then register that I came in a tradeswoman and left the same. No miracle. A plural noun at my own table, if I can keep it.”

Diomedes writes nothing, which in his language is an honour. “The door-book has categories under review.”

After she has gone, Daphne remains standing too long with the sandal strap in her hand. “She isn’t even one of ours.”

“Exactly,” Eirene says. “Pass the soup pot. Principles that only open inward are cupboards.”

Prima hears the story in its upgraded version at the fullers’ guild, where Saufia has become by Friday a woman carrying fire through a locked gate with soldiers at the margins. By the following Tuesday, on the Caelian, Daphne gives her the bathhouse edition with orchestration. Prima listens while mending the hem of a spring hanging that has met a chair leg and lost.

“Did she really hold it like a torch?” she asks.

“No,” Daphne says, with the melancholy of an artist corrected by reality. “It had rained. She held it so the ink wouldn’t spoil. It may be the most serious sentence said in Rome this year. If I sing it that way, nobody will pay.”

“Try a lower line.”

“Oh, the needlewoman has opinions on tessitura.”

“I have opinions on people telling a woman’s departure as if she needed to be on fire to be believed.”

The needle goes in and comes out. Antonia, who is examining cushion braid with more attention than braid can reasonably reward, says nothing. She is still learning when maternal pride—if that is the legal description of the upheaval—can be allowed into a room without changing the price of the work.

Prima has brought her own copy of the clause, purchased from the island-bridge scribe before the price rose. It lives now in her work-box under the needles, not with her mother’s leaves. A difference in filing that Antonia notices and does not annotate aloud.

“Will it apply to guilds?” Prima asks.

“Begin by assuming it applies wherever a man says it doesn’t,” Eirene says from the door, where she has arrived with water and an instinct for questions that can use a coarse first draft. “Then find your Greek.”

“I have a clerk.”

“Then you are civilised. Water?”

Later, when the room suggests refreshment at several speeds, Prima shows Antonia the copy—not for approval, but to ask where the difficult phrase sits if a woman’s refusal is not of work itself but of being held answerable for other people’s tools, debts, breakages. Diomedes, summoned by the ancient authority of a document unrolling in his vicinity, explains what can be explained without turning the explanation into a moat.

“Law is a border,” he says. “It tells where the design repeats and where somebody has put one flower wrong on purpose. Within it, the cloth still has to be kept.”

Prima looks at her border. “Then I want copies for the women who sign the government cloth. At my expense, half rate if the scribe remembers me.”

“Half rate if you remind him of his sister.”

“I do not know his sister.”

“Neither does he, half the year. Rome is run on contextual memory.”

Antonia hears in the joke the sound of machinery changing hands. The clause has travelled from a senator’s shaken conscience to a copyist’s extract to a fullers’ work-box, acquiring in transit the only authority that lasts in the city: use by women who can count.

On her way home Prima stops, not at the bridge this time, but at the scribe’s stall. The price has indeed risen. She buys three copies, negotiates the fourth as thread taken in part exchange, and has them folded small enough to survive other women’s aprons. A revolution may arrive by discount. Distribution is organisation, and she has been raised by people who understood both.

■

In the Forum the column has cleared the rooftops. Tourists from the provinces stand in its scaffolding's shadow with their heads back and their mouths open, counting, exactly as Prima counts stitches. Lentulus passes it on his way from a committee — a real committee now, on aqueducts, which flows through his remaining public life at a respectable rate — and a foreman he half-knows tells him the inside stair is continuous to the top now: a man can climb inside the war, when it is dedicated, and come out above it.

He walks home the long way, past the Greek's office, where he does not call; past the Basilica, where his agent is performing confidence in two languages; up the Palatine in the cooling light, a senator of ancient lineage and diminished prospects whose name the baths now pronounce in the past tense of Syria and the present tense of one clause that law students have begun, this term, to be set to argue about. Acilius has written that Hadrian, from Athens, inquired of the clause's draftsman — a Cornelius with a freedwoman's conscience, the secretaries are saying, which is the kind of joke that gets a man remembered in the wrong way by the right people, or the other way, in reigns to come.

The aqueducts committee suits him more than he first understands. Water, unlike ambition, announces its failures promptly. A channel silts; a pressure calculation is wrong; a district complains in language no rhetorician's Secretary can entirely beautify. Lentulus finds himself in the company of engineers, maintenance contractors and one unglamorous genius from Campania who speaks of gradients as moral philosophy. It is the first committee of his life in which the minutes frequently describe things that will happen.

“You have a talent for flow,” the Campanian tells him, without any observable irony. “Everybody important wants a fountain. Somebody has to ask where it comes from and what stops on the way.”

Lentulus hears the Caelian registrar in the words and keeps his face in the respectable columns. “I am lately interested in what does not reach its destination.”

“Leakage,” the engineer says, delighted. “The empire is mostly that.”

His old set has divided on him, as sets do. Some have filed the Syrian disappointment under weather. Some have discovered with hindsight that they always doubted him. A few, unexpectedly, have begun to invite him for precisely the qualities that were supposed to have disqualified: he can sit through a drainage estimate; he does not perform youthful hunger at the table; he knows what a clause costs when quoted by people who were not at the dinner where it was drafted.

Acilius, whose correspondence arrives as if from a better century, has taken to sending him extracts of other men’s talk. Hadrian in Athens, asking after the draftsman. A jurist in Baiae describing the clause as rough carpentry, but a door. An anonymous wit—there is a thriving population—saying that the Cornelii have at last contributed plumbing to both public morality and the water supply.

Lentulus writes back less often than courtesy recommends. What would he say? That the sentence was written by a man still believing a committee could launder history? That its authority was improved by a freedwoman in the Subura and two witnesses borrowed from a bread queue? He composes, in his head, several versions of the truth, each insufficiently senatorial.

His agent at the Basilica has no such inhibitions. “They are calling you the conscience of the drainage interest,” he says, nursing a contract that has gone through three languages and now means something in none. “I could sell that in a mild winter.”

“Kindly do not.”

“Humility as product has a short season, senator.”

“Then let it perish unsold.”

The agent looks at him as at cargo abandoned on a dock. “It is a name,” he says. “Most men in this building are paying interest on theirs.”

Lentulus thinks of the olive transaction, which has proceeded exactly as the Greek said it would: modestly, with papers. The debt is respectable, the obligation minuted, the temptation to disguise it as patronage resisted mostly by the fact that the Greek would have corrected his metaphors. He is learning the dignity of small transactions from people his family formerly employed to disappear them.

At a family dinner that week, an elderly cousin says, “At least Syria would have had weather,” and the table waits for the wound to declare itself. Lentulus watches Marcus put down his cup before it can become an answer. Servilia says, “Syria has weather whether Cornelius attends it or not. It is one of the province’s efficiencies,” and the evening is saved by administration.

Afterward Lentulus tells her, in the corridor between generations of wax, “You make even disappointment sound governed.”

“It is governed. I do it.”

“And the clause?”

“Also governed,” she says, “though not by you. Do not look so tragic. Things improve when your family’s authorship is diluted. Rivers, marriages, law.”

He has no answer in the first hand. In the second, after thirty years, he is beginning to think that dilution may be a form of survival his ancestors neglected because they preferred to remain undrinkable.

At home there is a letter half-written on his desk in Marcus's hand — Greek, terrible, sincere; his son leaves drafts like flags — addressed across the river. Lentulus does not read it. He puts a fresh sheet over it, weighs it with the dented mirror, and goes to stand a moment among the masks in the last of the light.

The draft has been there for two days because Marcus, still apprentice to the new domestic order, has not yet decided whether unfinished honesty should be hidden or merely not exhibited at dinner. He left it under the pretext of asking for a stylus. Lentulus recognised the manoeuvre from his own youth: a sensitive document abandoned in a parent’s landscape in the hope that weather will take responsibility for reading it.

He does not. It is the most difficult act of authorship occurring in the study that week.

Instead he calls Onesimus and asks for a fresh sheet, ostensibly for committee business. When Marcus appears at the door after dinner—too promptly, as if summoned by paper—Lentulus is writing a note about maintenance access to a channel outside the walls. Both men contemplate this respectable labour.

“Your Greek improves,” Lentulus says.

“You have not read it.”

“No.”

“Then how—” Marcus stops, and with real discomfort identifies the trap his own question has set. “Mother said you would not.”

“Your mother knows my current policies.”

“She writes most of them.”

“She improves their expression.”

Marcus sits, uninvited and already normal. His father keeps the fresh sheet in place with two fingers, not yet using the mirror as a weight; that small theatre belongs to later, when he is alone with all the unlit centuries.

“I keep saying sister too soon,” Marcus says. “Then I take it out. Then the letter sounds as if I am writing to a guild.”

“Perhaps you are writing to a person.”

“Father, I am attempting profundity. You might open a door.”

“I am avoiding one.” Lentulus puts the stylus down before it can be conscripted. “If I compose the sentence, Prima will receive a document from this house. She already has enough of those by inheritance.”

“She has none.”

“She has the consequences of several.”

The word Prima on his tongue is still a managed impropriety. He says it because the new discipline requires precision even where precision has no public use.

Marcus looks at the covered draft. “What did you want to say, when you were twenty-four?”

The study receives the question as it receives all dangerous furniture: by appearing unchanged. Lentulus has had the entire winter to formulate a reply suitable for the record. None of the versions have survived Antonia’s exit lines, his son’s third drafts or his own notebook. “I wanted the consequences to be administered elsewhere and the feelings to be admired at home. In that order.”

Marcus winces. “That is very plain.”

“It has been trying to enter the family language for some time.”

“And now?”

“Now I endeavour to keep my hands where I can see them.” He holds them, absurdly, on either side of the aqueduct note. It makes Marcus laugh once, not heralded, and the study—scrolls, mirror, corridor—allows a moment in which father and son are not competing to be the ruin of a narrative.

“She may never answer,” Marcus says.

“That possibility is not a defect in the letter.”

“Mother says a refusal is not an interruption. It is part of the sentence.”

“Your mother has been reading the committee.”

“No, Father. The committee has been catching up with her.”

He takes the draft away with him, folded once, not smoothed. Lentulus leaves the fresh sheet where it was and, after a moment, sets the dented mirror on it. The gesture is now less about keeping a document covered than about marking an empty place correctly.

Servilia finds him still in the atrium after the lamps have begun their small domestic campaign against the dark. She is in the indoors dress she wears when she is no longer distributing herself among guests, and she carries, incongruously for a woman who has made an art form of not being interrupted, a cup in each hand.

“Onesimus says you are consulting the management,” she says. “I have brought the committee wine.”

“The management is unanimous.”

“It frequently is, after death. It is their least burdensome qualification.” She gives him a cup. Together they look at the masks, which daylight has lately made cleaner and lamplight makes less forgiving. “Your grandfather looks as though the aqueducts have disappointed him.”

“My grandfather believed water reached the house by status.”

“Most men do, until a pipe is specified.”

For a while neither speaks. The house goes on around them: Cornelia’s music stopped in favour of sleep, Marcus somewhere abusing Greek in a private and improving manner, Onesimus converting evening into the shape it will need tomorrow. It is an ordinary peace, and Lentulus is sufficiently altered to notice that ordinary peace is not a substance automatically renewed by ancestry.

“Hadrian asked after me,” he says.

“So Acilius thinks we should be told.”

“It may mean nothing.”

“It may mean a provincial joke with good postal service.” She drinks. “Do you want it to mean more?”

The honest answer is in three columns and only one belongs in the atrium. “I want the work not to have been reduced to a scandal with one quotable sentence.”

“Then do work,” Servilia says. “Scandals dislike maintenance schedules. They lack the stamina.”

“And if that is all?”

She turns then, not towards the masks but toward him, which in their marriage is still less frequent than negotiations through architecture. “Gnaeus. A man may be remembered for a sentence he was forced by dawn, debt and a woman’s filing system to make true. It is not the worst thing written about this family on a wall.”

The use of his first name is so rare in her mouth that for a moment it has no address. Lentulus looks into his cup. “I am not forgiven.”

“No.”

“I do not expect it.”

“Then stop listening for it like weather.” She says it without cruelty. That may be what reaches him. “Accuracy does not applaud.”

He almost smiles. “I wrote that in a notebook. Or something unnecessarily close.”

“Marriage is plagiarism under management.”

They finish the wine in front of three centuries, who have heard worse settlements.

Choose better, his father wrote, dying, in the hand that gathered itself at the ends of lines.

“I chose worse for thirty years at the full rate,” Lentulus tells the wax, conversationally, as a man settles with his creditors in private. “The interest is the estate now. I am merely keeping it lit.” The masks say nothing. They have been saying it, eloquently, for three hundred years.

Chapter Twenty-One

A Wedding in the Morning

. . .

Cornelia marries young Avidius on an auspicious morning in the early summer, with the whole expensive machinery of a Roman wedding making its noise around her: flutes, torches at noon, nuts thrown at futures, the bride's saffron veil worn — Servilia's last act of generalship — like a banner rather than a shroud. The groom winces twice, once at the contract's Latin and once, gloriously, at his own relief. Marcus behaves. This is minuted by no one and noticed by everyone: the heir of the Cornelii is sober, attentive, kind to old women; the baths will take a week to find a sinister explanation, the truth — that he has been reading his own letter for a month and learning the cost of language — being unsuited to plumbing.

The morning begins long before the auspicious hour, in rooms where women have been awake since the less sacred one. Cornelia’s dress hangs ready like a small state awaiting inauguration. Her hair must be parted and bound in the ancient style; her veil must lie over it; her girdle must be tied by hands that can pretend symbolism is primarily a matter of knots. The old nurse cries while doing competent work. Servilia, whose capacity for emotion in an emergency is usually expressed through seating plans, discards two arrangements of flowers and then restores the first with the air of a general conceding that the frontier has views.

Cornelia sits still under ministrations. “Do brides always feel like a room being prepared for other people’s furniture?” she asks.

“They are not encouraged to file reports,” her mother says.

“I am filing this one in the box.”

“At the front.”

The box—papers, copies, schedule of her music master's fee, the new plain notebook she has begun to imitate from some influence her father affects not to identify—has already been sent ahead under her maid's personal guard. It matters to Cornelia obscurely that the box will enter the Avidian house before she does. A person should have an advance party.

Downstairs Marcus is being made presentable by a household that has stopped expecting catastrophe from him and therefore finds his cooperation faintly suspicious. Onesimus removes an imaginary thread from his shoulder. "Master Marcus is early," he observes.

"I am practising instalments."

"Of punctuality, sir?"

"Of being a brother." The word is out before he can amend its scope. Onesimus, whose diplomacy has survived the administration of three generations, treats the singular as perfectly adequate. "In this house, practice is commonly mistaken for a plot. Bear it."

Lentulus receives the Avidian party in the atrium beneath the masks. There are formal words and hands and documents, torches even at the wrong time of day, because tradition is a landlord that expects rent regardless of light. Avidius the elder stands with a harbour-man's intolerance for ceremony that cannot be weighed. Avidius the younger is pale in a way that flatters neither his tailor nor his self-image.

When Cornelia comes in, saffron-veiled, the younger man's relief is so undisguised that the flute players pause in sympathy with it. It is possible to see at once that she is not entering a romance manufactured for ballads. She is entering a negotiation in which one party has already learned not to look surprised when she speaks. In Rome, this is a door. Many marriages have less furniture.

The contract Latin proceeds. Somebody's child throws nuts too early and is removed by an aunt with battlefield efficiency. Marcus stands where a brother should, gives the expected answers with the expected face, and privately amends the official seating by thinking of another woman across a river who has corrected him in a dining room. He does not confuse the sisters. That would be cheap. He holds the two kinds of good fortune in separate hands: one veiled at noon among ancestors, the other, probably at this minute, naming a price for cloth with her mouth full of pins.

At the wedding breakfast Cornelia asks—not silently, not through a steward, not by making the request sound as if it had originated in furniture—whether she may sing one song before the formal music begins. It takes the room a second to understand that a bride has used a verb in the first person. Servilia looks at the ceiling. There is, on the ceiling, a fresco concerning agricultural abundance. She studies it as if it had been painted by the household gods for emergency consultation.

“One,” she says.

Cornelia sings the Greek song, not too fast, with the turn in the middle verse her master no longer corrects. Young Avidius cries when the flutes can cover it. Marcus does not; he has become too well educated this winter to waste the moment on an easily misfiled grimace. Lentulus hears his declared daughter take breath where she chooses and understands, among torch smoke and marriage nuts, that exits can be forms of arrival when they are not conducted by stewards.

Antonia receives an account of it from three directions, as she receives everything: the door-book (guests of both houses dine on the Caelian that week and talk, as men do, in the order of the courses rather than the questions), the Greek (the dowry's settlement has released, through agents, a significance of payment toward Campanian paper), and Eirene, who has a cousin in service at the Acilii and no shame anywhere in her system.

The door-book version arrives in fragments at dinner. A client of the Avidii, full of wedding food and maritime equity, reports that the Cornelian bride has a voice; a cousin of somebody says the Greek song was “a compliment to the shipping interest”; a man who has been wrong about every public event since the dedication announces that Servilia has lost control of her daughter. The house records the first two accounts under Amusements and leaves the third to natural decay.

The Greek's version arrives on paper and is therefore more dangerous. Diomedes reads it in the office and gives Antonia the shape without the seals: dowry funds moving out of the Palatine, certain Campanian obligations eased, an Avidian settlement entering Cornelia's name through channels a hostile accountant would find unusually well lit. There has been, in addition, a payment to a music master described so blamelessly that any future husband will have to be a philosopher to unpick it.

"Servilia," Diomedes says, with professional awe, "has taught the harbour to put money where her daughter can reach it and call the arrangement respect for art."

"Art is an excellent cloak. It has pockets."

"Also, madam, a modest sum has passed from the Campanian paper toward our side of the current obligations. Nothing addressed. Nothing named. The olive affair remains in its columns like a well-trained citizen."

Antonia looks at the figures without touching them. There was a time—seventeen, nineteen, Baiae, Naples—when money arrived in her vicinity only in sleeves, reports, threats or stories other people could deny by breakfast. Now sums travel across the city trailing clerks. It is not justice, which would require a different empire. It is at least weather that has learned to sign.

"Enter it as received."

"It is entered."

"Without a metaphor, Diomedes."

"The third book has no metaphors before dinner."

From the Acilii, by Eirene's cousinly intelligence service, comes the version with knives in it: which aunt approved of the song and which required smelling salts; whether Marcus's sobriety is seen as reform or as an ominous novelty; whether young Avidius looked at his bride like a bill of lading or like a person. Eirene delivers the report while cutting up a chicken for stock, a process that lends all social intelligence a useful sense of proportion.

“The boy looked as if he’d been handed weather and asked to govern it kindly,” she says. “Could be worse. I have seen bridegrooms look like tax collectors discovering arrears.”

“And Cornelia?”

“Like a singer who has read the contract.”

Antonia files that, privately, in the book with no formal headings. A girl who reads the contract. It is the difference between generations compressed into one domestic verb.

“Would Servilia approve of your cousin?”

“She approves of all information. She disapproves of being seen to receive it. There are management styles worse, love.”

The three accounts settle, as accounts do, into a picture none of them individually owned: a wedding accomplished, a troublesome young woman exported into an allied house with papers of her own, a son behaving at a rate that has destabilised bathhouse economics, a father discovering that being present in the present tense has administrative consequences.

“She sang at her own wedding breakfast,” Eirene reports. “One song. The Greek one. Her mother, they say, looked at the ceiling as if consulting an upstairs neighbour, and let her. And the Avidius boy cried where the flutes could cover it, which the cousin says is the most patrician thing she's ever seen a man do.”

“Let her,” Antonia says, tasting a sauce. “That is Servilia's whole art, according to Diomedes, who reveres her like a rival firm: knowing which instructions to be disobeyed in.” She looks across the kitchen to where Prima, installing the summer hangings, is standing on a stool with pins in her mouth, engaged in not falling off the year’s whole metaphor. “Prima. When you marry your baker — guild, mourning, and your future mother-in-law's calendar permitting — you will not have flutes at noon. The neighbours would report the household to itself.”

“I shall have bread,” Prima says around the pins, “at all hours. It compounds better.”

“You will have,” Antonia says, with the air of a woman filing something between quarters, “whatever this house can send across a river that smells of respectability and keeps like money. Which is to say: also bread. I am rich, Prima, not imaginative. The imagination in the family has always been on the stairs side.”

The kitchen laughs — the whole kitchen, the pastry cook from Alexandria laughing in Greek at a Roman widow-inventing joke — and Prima, descending from the stool into the world's ordinary level, looks around at the big stove, the arguing empire of it, with an expression Antonia can read as easily as a tax receipt: this, too, is a house where women keep things standing; we merely charge admission to the keeping, which in Rome is called every name except honest.

After the laughter settles back into saucepans, Prima climbs the stool again. The summer hangings are lighter than the spring set, less red in the border, intended for rooms where heat makes men imagine that their opinions have become thinner too. Barbatus stands beneath her without being asked and takes pins one at a time from a cushion. It is absurd and touching, a former gladiator inducted into the auxiliary forces of interior decoration.

“Did she wear flowers?” Prima asks suddenly.

The kitchen knows which she. Eirene says, “Saffron veil, flowers according to rank, a knot a ship’s chaplain could preach from.”

“And she chose the song?”

“Chose it, sang it, survived the ceiling.”

Prima works for a while. “I do not want to sing at mine.”

“Nobody has proposed it,” Antonia says.

“I know. I am registering objections before the committee develops.”

Daphne, arranging figs into a pattern no guest will appreciate before ruining, says, “You can have me at a discount.”

“The neighbours would think Titus had allied with Alexandria.”

“Your mother-in-law would inspect the alliance and find the thread separate.”

It draws a laugh from Prima that Antonia is learning to let pass without making it into ancestry. Not every sound must be filed as an inheritance. Some sounds are just a girl being funny before lunch.

Still, the wedding on the Palatine has thrown its shadow across the room in the way a large public event can remeasure smaller private ones. Prima's own marriage is approaching in the guild calendar—after mourning, after contracts, after Mother Livia has inspected every object that may legally move between houses. There will be food at sane hours, a procession without a vehicular empire, witnesses who work with cloth and fire. Yet suddenly people in this kitchen are speaking to her as if Cornelia's saffron veil has issued a challenge in couture.

"I do not want a bigger wedding," Prima says, as if someone had accused her of ambition.

"Good," says Eirene. "Big weddings are mostly other people eating your future in public."

"I want the papers at my table."

"They will be." Antonia speaks before caution can make it legalistic. "Your papers, your witnesses, your mother-in-law's calendar at the correct weight."

"And no letters arriving in Greek." She says it lightly, then sees the room take it too seriously. "That was a joke."

Daphne says, "In this house jokes are minuted as early drafts."

Prima descends and inspects the hanging from floor level. One corner falls wrong. She goes up the stool again, Barbatus shifting below her without touching her ankle or making a drama of gods. Her competence is a relief from symbolism, and Antonia stands among sauce steam and copper pans thinking how much of a life arrears of love expresses itself as: somebody competent, in the middle height of a room, being handed pins at the exact moment they are needed.

"Titus holds ladders," Daphne says, meditatively, "and Barbatus hands pins. We are becoming a support organisation."

"Revolution," Eirene says, "at catering prices."

Large events always generate small taxes. By the end of wedding week, three separate clients have asked Antonia whether Greek music is now to be the fashion at respectable houses, which is Rome's way of discovering whether it should take offence before or after paying. Daphne's price for teaching a banker's niece one discreet song doubles without a meeting being held. The niece, it transpires, wants only to annoy a stepmother whose ears are so patrician they require a veil. Daphne takes the commission and declines the bonus for secrecy. "Secrecy is a surcharge that always comes back wearing somebody else's face," she says, and wonders aloud when she learned to talk like the house.

Antonia could tell her. It happens around the time a woman sees her name correctly entered under her own money and discovers that charm does not have to report to a committee.

That evening Diomedes presents the wedding in balance-sheet form: not the money—money has already had its audience—but the shifts of risk. Marcus is less likely now to be used as a casual weapon by men who want his father's attention. Cornelia has an allied roof, her own schedule, and a bridegroom whose family understands cargo insurance. The Caelian house has neither gatecrashed its safety nor appeared at the wedding in any form more material than a border's maker's knife-work perhaps known to three people and God.

"Prima's position?" Antonia asks.

"Guild: rising. Bakery: entered. Household: hers. Correspondents: under discipline." Diomedes closes the tablet. "In the third book, madam, she is no longer represented as an omission."

Antonia looks out at the courtyard where the overwatered roses are doing their best with ill-applied love. "What is she represented as?"

"A tradeswoman with columns."

It is, from Diomedes, a coronation.

Across the river that evening, Prima gives her own account of the invisible wedding to the only audience licensed for the full emotional edition: nobody. She works on the tunic she has already altered twice, lets out a seam by a fraction and decides Titus is either expanding under bakery government or being measured each week by hope.

Mother Livia arrives with two loaves and a list. “The guild will do the tables,” she says. “Your uncle by guild has a courtyard if it rains. The baker women will not be put under the fullers in seating, whatever the registrar’s sense of poetry. A wedding is a town, girl. It needs streets.”

“What if I want a village?”

“Then half the town will stand outside acting offended. Better feed them indoors where we can supervise their gratitude.” She looks at the tunic. “You have let him out again.”

“He breathes at work.”

“So does an oven, and we don’t marry it.” But she folds the garment with the tenderness she reserves for money and children. “He is a good size in his sentences, my son. Says what he knows. Leaves room around what he doesn’t. That is rarer than a veil.”

Prima thinks of a saffron veil at noon and torches inexplicable to weather. She thinks of another young woman singing in Greek because she has chosen to, in a room of ancestors who once gave those choices to stewards. Their kinship still has no social word, but at certain hours it has a practical shape: both of them being prepared for lives negotiated by women who have read the schedules.

“I hope her husband pays the music master on time,” she says.

Mother Livia, who knows by pulse when a sentence has another family standing behind it, asks no names. “If he doesn’t, she can sing at him until his accounts improve. Music is a tool. Like a good hem. Not decorative in the right hands.”

Titus comes in with flour to the elbow and news that the courtyard can indeed be borrowed if the fullers lend two benches. He sees the list, the loaves, his tunic and Prima’s face in one efficient sweep. “Am I entering negotiations?”

“You are entering a town,” his mother says. “Mind the streets.”

He looks at Prima. “I can hold a ladder.”

“There may be putting up of garlands,” she says. “We are considering your qualifications.”

“At last, a wedding arranged around my talents.”

It goes into her new strip of accounts that night, not among liabilities: Ladders, reliable. Bread, several kinds. Song, unregistered, elsewhere.

On the seventh day after the wedding, a parcel arrives at the Caelian from the Avidian house. It is not addressed to Antonia. That would be an incident, and the harbour families pride themselves on cargo that does not leap from the manifest. It is addressed, through the Greek’s outer office, to the tradeswoman who made the summer hangings in which a customer of the Avidii has lately admired the finishing. There is an order for two lengths, measurements to follow, payment by the piece. The hand on the attached note is a Secretary’s.

Diomedes presents it in the linen room with the expression of a man laying a treaty before an allied power.

Prima reads it twice: once for the commission, once for the join. “Whose thought was this?”

“A shipping family has many clerks.”

“Diomedes.”

“The thought has no return address. That is its charm and its limitation.”

Antonia watches her decide. On a different Tuesday, in a worse world, this might be patronage disguised as lace. On this one, the measurements are real, the price is market rate with a tendency, and the customer has seen the work because the work was good enough to be noticed in rooms where women’s labour ordinarily becomes scenery.

“I’ll send an estimate,” Prima says. “Thread extra, because their rooms are larger and it will matter.”

“An exact reply.”

“If it is her idea—” She stops before the family vocabulary rushes in and upholsters the sentence. “If it is anyone’s idea who cannot sign it, the estimate will still be an answer.”

She writes it herself, in her firm new hand: materials, time, conditions for hanging, no work accepted on mourning days still owed to her father. At the bottom, not in the main invoice, she adds: The red can be reduced for summer if the room takes strong light.

It is a professional sentence. It is also, across a city of veils and boards, one young woman telling another—hypothetically, deniably, at market rate—that she understands rooms and what glare does to colour.

Antonia does not inform her that Cornelia's newlywed home faces, according to the schedule Marcus described in an unguarded moment to Daphne, west into the exact weather described. There are messages women are allowed to send without mothers annotating the postage.

"Seal it," she says.

Prima presses the seal with the side of her thimble, because she has no family signet and does not intend to acquire a personality at a metalworker's. The mark comes out indistinct and entirely adequate: a circle, a pressure, an answer.

■

Servilia, in the week after the wedding, does the thing no committee drafted: she calls on the Caelian. Not at dining hour. At the dead middle of the afternoon, veiled in the style women of her order wear to temples and assignations of state, with one slave who waits in the street with the chair and the family talent, bred over generations of service, for being furniture. Barbatus announces her by no name at all, in the doorway, in the voice of a man reporting weather of an imperial size: "A lady by appointment with nobody, mistress."

She has considered the visit since the contract signing, and considered is the correct Servilian verb: weighed, routed, stripped of accidental witnesses. She does not tell Lentulus. He would formulate a policy about it and then spend the afternoon obeying the policy in a room full of masks. She does not tell Marcus, whose new integrity is still young enough to be startled into literature. She tells Onesimus that she is paying a call connected with the pastry at the Acilii, which is true in the sense that Rome is full of pastry and false in every operational detail.

The chair goes not directly to the Caelian but by a route that takes in a shrine where she is known to leave offerings. She makes an offering. Management, to Servilia, includes not lying to gods she may later need at short notice. The slave who waits has belonged to her side of the marriage for twenty-six years and has reached a stage of discretion that borders on geology.

At the Caelian door Barbatus looks at the veiled lady, at the chair, at the hour, and reaches a series of conclusions without altering his posture. “House is between services,” he says.

“So am I.”

Something in the voice travels downward through his training like a familiar signal in an unfamiliar camp. He does not say a name. He opens the door by the six inches necessary for revelation to enter without procession, and announces her in a formula that should be inscribed over the public records of the empire.

Inside, the house is not as Servilia expected. She has known brothels by reputation, dinner clubs by marriage and this establishment principally as a problem of columns. In the dead afternoon it smells of linen and stock and floor oil. A girl is practising scales somewhere without theatrical intent. Furniture is better than it needs to be and plainer than rumour has supplied. Eirene passes through the courtyard with an armful of napkins, sees the visitor, and becomes, by instantaneous professional decision, entirely elsewhere.

“Your porter is well trained,” Servilia says, when Antonia has come down with a working woman’s lack of fanfare.

“He was trained by arenas. We merely provide doors.”

“My household could use his taxonomy. I am a lady by appointment with nobody at least twice a week.”

It is as close as either comes to an introduction. Servilia removes neither veil nor dignity at once. Antonia does not ask her to. She indicates the small dining room, where afternoon light falls in a shape later useful to painters and presently useful to women who need to see one another without being blinded by symbolism.

Before sitting, Servilia looks at the hangings: summer issue, red reduced, the border falling correctly now. “The needlewoman from across the river,” she says.

“Vibia Prima.”

“Yes.” The name is received, not repeated. It may be the first concession of the visit.

“Cakes,” Antonia says. “Water. The house can provide wine, but negotiations have been known to improve without it.”

“Water,” Servilia says. “My husband has developed an interest in it as governance. I should hate to be underinformed.”

They sit in the small dining room, sized — Antonia decides in mid-breath — to nobody's self-regard at all: two chairs, the house's best water, a bowl of the pastry cook's least argumentative cakes. Two women of forty in a city that has arranged their lives as a diptych: the one kept by the family like its standard in battle, the other sold by it like surplus baggage after one. Neither has ever been allowed, by the minuting habits of Rome, to be the other's contemporary. In a room, at a table, with cakes, the fact becomes sayable, the way things in this family do, by not being said.

“You gave her the clause,” Servilia says, without preamble, because preamble is for men who schedule. “My husband. For your women to cite over their contracts.”

“He gave the Senate a sentence. The house has adopted it at the usual rates.”

“My daughter sang Greek at her wedding.” Servilia selects a cake, inspects it like a minor treaty, eats it. “The whole city will decide I have lost authority. I find I have gained a daughter-in-law's family who pay musicians properly. It is the best exchange I have made since marrying the Cornelii, which the gods may file under their own irony.” She looks, then, directly — it is said in the Palatine house that Servilia's direct look has ended more this year campaigns than the prefect's office. “The girl across the river. Is she—” A search, through registers: provided, settled, the whole dowry of un-saying. Servilia, who has run out of quarter in which to file things, finishes the sentence like a woman, at last, in her own hand. “Is she happy in her arrangement, Antonia? Baking and hems?”

“She is stitching a life at her own prices,” Antonia says. “With a man who holds ladders. She knows what knowing is worth here and spends it in her own street. That is as close to happiness as my people file, Servilia.”

There is a pause then in which both women become aware of being forty—not old by the standards of their households, not young by the standards of their memories. Servilia’s hands are unadorned by afternoon policy except for one ring that could buy a boat if boats were sold by women who understood rings. Antonia’s carry a lifetime of work disguised as management: ink near one nail, a small burn from supervising a sauce at too close a range, no rings at all when she is about her own house.

“You did not come for an audit,” Antonia says.

“I have auditors. Half my family now qualifies.” Servilia takes water. “I came because a woman of my order is eventually required to look at the part of the map the roads were built around.”

“An expedition.”

“Do not let it go to your provincial importance.”

“Madam, I am an institution now. Rome writes to me by appointment.”

The smallest alteration occurs around Servilia’s mouth—not a smile, an adjustment to light. “You would have enjoyed certain rooms.”

“I was not invited to enjoy them.”

“No.” The admission is unadorned. Servilia does not arrange it into an apology, which would be an insult to both their intelligence. “Your exclusion was part of my marriage settlement. I did not draft that clause. I lived well under it.”

Antonia feels the sentence settle where so many others have failed to land. It does not open a compensation schedule. It does something more useful and less theatrical: it gives the room two adults in it.

“Would you have married him knowing everything?” she asks, because the afternoon has already broken several laws whose jurisdiction neither woman respects.

Servilia considers. She is not a woman who answers hypothetical questions from the surface. “I married the Cornelii. He was included as resident management. Had I known the child lived, I would have required a better settlement for the child—and a worse one for my father-in-law. Whether that is morality or pricing, I leave to priests and the Greek.”

“He would charge for the distinction.”

“All the best authorities do.”

From elsewhere in the building comes the muted beginning of dinner: crockery, water, Ammonius discovering a philosophical objection to mint. Servilia listens as to an allied province through a wall. “My daughter has your clause in her music schedule, by the way. Not the words. The structure. Fees in her name. Refusal preserved in accountancy. My husband believes it is his influence.”

“Men require a pedigree for ideas.”

“Hers comes from several houses.” Servilia looks towards the hanging with the corrected corner. “When I tell her—about the river—it will not be as a scandal. I shall tell her as family information that arrives in the wrong century, like most of our property.”

“That is your business.”

“Yes. I am informing you as a courtesy, not consulting you as an annex.”

Antonia nods. Courtesy, between these two, is the only form of diplomatic relations currently solvent. “Prima decides what she receives from your house. One letter at a time. No choir.”

“My son has been instructed that sincerity is not a ram.”

“Then there has been progress in the siege department.”

This time the adjustment around Servilia's mouth does qualify. "We are," she says, "a modern family. We communicate by withholding correctly."

"Your people." Servilia considers the cakes. "And mine. My son has written her a letter."

"I advised keeping it with her tools. Evidence of what men cost, in their own handwriting."

"It will be Greek and terrible."

"I said so too." Antonia, to her own extreme inconvenience, feels the sentence arrive that she has not minuted and cannot invoice. "He meant it well. In our families —" she stops. Re-files. "That is new. That can stay."

"He meant it well," Servilia repeats, testing the phrase as if it were a coin her family used to issue without adequate silver. "My husband meant nothing for thirty years, which gave his intentions an excellent credit rating. Marcus is overcorrecting. He will require supervision until meaning and manners converge."

"Prima will supervise by not being impressed."

"That is a form of instruction our tutors never mastered." Servilia looks down at the table, an unusually honest direction for her. "There is another matter. The wedding settlement has released a small amount which my husband wanted routed—let us not soil the afternoon with the Greek's exact architecture—to the girl's household."

"No."

Antonia says it without heat, and consequently it fills the room. Servilia does not look startled. She looks, if anything, reassured that the frontier is defended by someone who knows its geography.

"I expected opposition."

"Then your husband expected a refusal and wanted it delivered by a better diplomat."

"He wanted to be told whether a further contribution would be accuracy or interference."

“Prima has been provided under forms she can show her guild without lying at it. Any additional money now begins to look like your house purchasing a son’s correspondence rights, or a father’s relief at post-wedding prices.”

Servilia inclines her head. “Interference.”

“With excellent table manners.”

“Those are the expensive kind.” She sets down her cup in an exact circle of damp left by some earlier conference. “The amount will remain where it is, in case need ever drafts a better argument. I shall tell my husband a refusal is not an interruption.”

“He is learning the phrase at several frontiers.”

“He learned it here.” Servilia rises a fraction, then sits again, which for her constitutes an earthquake. “One more discourtesy. When Cornelia asks, one day, whether her father was—” Words present themselves in all registers: wicked, weak, young, Roman. She dismisses the parade. “What will your house say?”

Antonia considers the other woman across the cakes, neither ally nor defendant. “My house will say your husband wrote a clause and that women made it work. If she comes to me herself, she will have more than our party line. Until then she has enough houses speaking from behind curtains.”

Servilia nods, once. It has the weight of a treaty clause nobody will ever sign. “A woman should know which questions are hers in her own handwriting.”

“Did Prima say that?”

“No. I have some original sentences.”

“I am relieved. The family was becoming a quotation bureau.”

Servilia rises. The visit has lasted exactly the length of a temple call; the slave in the street will report a temple call. At the door she looks back across the small dining room, the plain good furniture of it, the house beyond beginning its evening the way a ship begins a tide. “We were both bought, you know,” she says, conversationally, as one quartermaster to another. “The currencies differed. I believe that is what my husband's clause is about, draftsman though he was of everything else. Do not let the law students explain it to you. They will make it smaller."

"Come again when the committee is forgotten," Antonia says. "The cakes improve by quarter. It is our whole fiscal policy."

"I do not make social calls I cannot describe to my household gods." Servilia arranges her veil with hands expert and, for the first time in Antonia's observation of them at shrine-distance, not quite certain of the fold. "But I may send for the recipe. Rome will call that the beginning of the end, and for once the baths will be right at their usual rate of accuracy."

Chapter Twenty-Two

Letters from Athens

. . .

The emperor will go east; that much the stone yards know, the granaries know, the letter-writers of Athens know at flattering length. Hadrian writes to Rome in the accomplished hand of a man collecting a world: architecture, cults, old friendships renewed like leases. His name goes up one side of the city's future and down the other. Syria goes — the secretaries settle it over the summer like a cloth over a table — to a safer pair of hands, a man whose private geometry contains no Caelian angles, no clauses. Lentulus receives the news from Acilius in the baths, where all great disappointments in Rome are steamed for tenderness.

The change is visible first in the volume of other people's stationery. Couriers come off the eastern roads with dust in the seams of their cloaks. Contractors who were unbearable in January acquire, by June, the gracious fatigue of men who have already been paid to think ahead. In the stone yards the conversation shifts from what will be dedicated to what must be shipped: timber for bridging, iron, millstones, rope by the mile. The granaries are quieter about it, as granaries are, but quantities have their own eloquence if a man knows how to read a tally without making it sound like treason.

Hadrian's letters from Athens are copied almost as soon as they are unsealed. They are not the letters of a mere traveller. They are inventories in the grammatical form of friendship: temples measured, notables sounded, grievances elegantly rephrased, offices considered from the far side of the sea as one might consider pieces left on a board in another room. Acilius, whose name appears in them with a warmth that has caused three younger men to revise their seating arrangements, gives Lentulus a summary before the baths have had it. It is an old courtesy. It is also a warning delivered at a temperature neither of them needs to name.

“There is praise,” Acilius says in the changing room, while slaves make a liturgy of towels. “Of your committee’s drafting hand. Not the clause itself. The hand.”

“A distinction with a view,” Lentulus says.

“Hadrian likes men who write as if words have weight. He distrusts men whose words acquire crowds.”

“I had a committee. Crowds were an administrative by-product.”

“You had a sentence, Gnaeus. It has begun to travel without your luggage.”

The appointee for Syria is not yet named in the official ink, but a safe name is being repeated with the confidence of weather already felt in the bones. He is competent. He is well connected. His domestic arrangements, so far as Rome can discover, contain no women whose filing systems might become constitutional history overnight. This last point is not made directly; directness is for engineers. It is conveyed by everybody’s sudden refreshment when his virtues are listed.

Lentulus hears the list and finds, to his own surprise, no stab of intimate outrage. There is disappointment, the old public animal lifting its head. There is also an odd sensation as of a door being shut by somebody else on a room he no longer lives in. All winter he imagined Syria as the place where the family account might be rebalanced by distance. Summer has introduced him to a more humiliating and promising theory: that distance is what has been applied to his obligations, at compound rates, for three decades.

A young secretary passes with a message for Acilius. The message is not for Lentulus, and the secretary makes the small, perfect bow men make when a document’s route is itself news. In another year Lentulus would have felt the omission as a wound dressed in protocol. Today he notices the secretary’s sandals are newly soled and that the man is left-handed. The city has become legible at floor level. It is not consolation. It may be tuition.

“It was the clause, in the end?” Acilius asks it gently; there is a consul's kindness that consists of not requiring a man to watch his own autopsy.

“It was the appearance of a man who might, in a province, write another one.” Lentulus settles into the warm water up to the ribs; the shoulder from Moesia gives its opinion in the old language. “I find I do not believe in the east anymore, Acilius. Not as a cure. My father governed provinces to keep from governing his house. The house is where the interest accrues. You may tell Athens I said something about my health.”

Acilius lets that sit in the steam before he disturbs it. He has the manners of an older Rome, in which silence between friends was not immediately subdivided into lots and sold.

“You could still make representations,” he says at last. “Not for Syria. That ship has been caulked. For the kind of work that puts a man back into the manifest in smaller print.”

“You sound as if you have been dining with shipowners.”

“I have been governing long enough to know when a metaphor has stopped being mine. The water board needs a curator with a name heavy enough to frighten contractors and a reputation light enough to be inspected. It is not the Euphrates.”

“No.”

“It does flow.”

Lentulus puts his head back against the warm stone. The shoulder is easing. In the next chamber somebody is telling a Dacian story in which the same river is crossed increasingly well by the same man. The baths are full of revisions. “When I was young, Acilius, I thought public life was a kind of architecture. Put the right name over the right arch and the centuries would keep the roof on.”

“And now?”

“Now I think it is drains. What we praise is mostly the smell not arriving.”

“You have become profound in a very unmarketable direction.”

“My wife says maintenance has no stamina for scandal.”

“Your wife should be set to draft something. With her own seal. It would clarify the century.”

There it is, light as a towel dropped between them: the old male joke made true by the year. Lentulus does not laugh at first, because the idea—Servilia’s hand on an actual public document, uncontained by dinners, weddings and the correct deployment of silence—belongs to a Rome neither of them will live to be inconvenienced by. Then he does laugh, quietly, in the water. “She already drafts the household. The public is merely where we attend the consequences aloud.”

Acilius studies him with an expression that in a less controlled man would be affection. “You are not going to make a scene, then. Athens can be spared a bruised Cornelius arriving by post.”

“I have made scenes in arrears. They were billed to other people.”

The sentence goes through the steam without applause. Acilius has known him too long to pretend it is a casual remark disguised as wit. “And the clause?” he asks. “If Hadrian’s people raise it as evidence that you are—what is the fashionable formulation?—unreliable at boundaries.”

“Then tell them boundaries are where my family has done most of its building.” Lentulus opens his eyes. The ceiling sweats in patterns no architect intended. “No. Do not tell Athens epigrams. Tell them I accept work where competence can be tested by whether people can drink.”

“That,” Acilius says, “is nearly an epigram.”

“Then let it be entered as health.”

“I shall tell Athens you are wanted on aqueducts.”

“Aqueducts,” Lentulus says, with feeling, “are the one public work a Cornelius can supervise where what flows downhill is only water.”

The aqueduct appointment comes with a staff that smells of wet lime and does not care about his grandfather except when the name must be used to unlock a store yard. This is good for everyone. On the third morning, out beyond the walls where the arcades stride over market gardens like a sentence the landscape has agreed to remember, Lentulus walks the inspection path with the Campanian engineer and a clerk whose tablets are warped by years of outdoor truth.

“Here,” the engineer says, and taps an arch with the intimacy of a physician. A fine mist of mortar descends. “The maps call this restored.”

“Was it?”

“It was paid for. In Rome the verbs are cousins, not twins.”

They find the leak not by the grand damp stain a senator could point to but by a change in the voices of women filling jars at a fountain below: pressure sighing at certain hours, disappearing when the villas above take their evening share. Lentulus listens to a woman with a child tied to her back and a jar on her hip explain exactly when the water fails. She does so without civic vocabulary and with a precision his committee papers, at their most expensive, rarely achieved.

“She should be on the board,” he says.

“She is,” says the engineer. “Unofficially. All the fountains are.”

By midsummer he has developed opinions about settling tanks. By late summer, worse still from the point of view of the baths, he can tell whether a contractor is lying about lead by watching where his eyes go when a measurement is read back. Marcus comes out once under the excuse of riding and stays three hours because nobody expects a senator’s heir to be useful and the novelty has a freedom in it. He holds a survey cord. He gets lime on a boot. He asks the engineer whether water minds the names carved on the arches.

“Water minds the gradient,” says the engineer. “Names are for the leaking to occur under.”

Marcus looks at his father in the hard roadside light. Lentulus is in a plain cloak, arguing good-humouredly about access rights with a market gardener who has planted beans in a maintenance strip and intends to defend them as a second harvest of liberty. There is no proconsular glamour to it. There is a man being improved by facts that will not march in a procession.

“You like this,” Marcus says on the ride home.

“I like arriving at things that are supposed to arrive.”

“Father, that is perilously close to a motto.”

“Then we will not carve it.”

They pass one of the repaired fountains. A boy is drinking straight from the spout with his whole face, ignoring the cup his sister offers in the name of civilisation. Lentulus watches for a moment longer than a curator’s duty requires. It comes into his head that a monument can be made of not noticing: nobody, in a year, will praise the water for being there. Anonymous success. His ancestors would have required smelling salts.

That night he writes in the plain notebook: Work that disappears when done properly. Underneath, after an interval in which he hears Cornelia from the Avidian house only by the intermediary of letters and Marcus’s unfinished drafts from the next room, he adds: Not all legacies are inscriptions.

The second sentence displeases him as sententious. He leaves it. Improvement does not have to be elegantly expressed to be entered.

He does not rage, which the household finds more alarming than rage and Servilia finds, correctly, elegiac. He takes the aqueduct work with the whole force of a disappointed competence; inside the year, two leaking arcades on the road to Praeneste will bear, in small unglamorous lettering no tourist will ever photograph with their mouth open, the name of the curator who made the water arrive where the maps had always claimed it did. Marcus, watching his father choose maintenance over monument, writes the fifth draft of his letter, in which the Greek is suddenly half the length and the sincerity twice, and sends it across the river by Barbatus — who charges, as messenger, one new-mended cloak strap, the house's real currency — with no seal and his own name, which costs him more than any seal in the collections of his ancestors.

The drafts occupy Marcus longer than most young men’s love affairs, and with a better outcome for the mail. The third he keeps. The fourth is the third rewritten after an evening at the baths where Hostilius, now paid in real money and therefore spiritually unemployed, tries to be witty about “fullers’ fortunes” and discovers that Marcus’s silence has acquired edges.

“You used to feed me,” Hostilius complains.

“I have taken up ballast.”

“It makes you very poor company for a creditor’s former art.”

“I shall enter the review.”

He goes home and cuts from the fourth draft every sentence that sounds as though it were written to be overheard by posterity. What remains has air around it. It says he knows what he knows late. It says he stood at the edge of her father’s funeral and is not asking to be forgiven for either presence or absence. It says her correction in the dining room was the first time anyone had spoken of his family as if it were a family and that he has since been trying to learn the grammar.

He writes sister once and nearly removes it. It stands, because removal would be another kind of theft: asking the document to pretend it does not know why it exists.

The fifth draft happens after the aqueduct ride. Marcus sees a sentence about the house I was born to and crosses it out so hard the stylus complains. In its place he writes the rooms I was allowed to enter without asking. It is not perfect. It is nearly true, which in his education has usually been the sign of a draft approaching usefulness.

Barbatus is selected as messenger not because he is discreet—Barbatus is discreet in the way mountains are quiet—but because he is already a known quantity on both banks and cannot be mistaken for an embassy. He is found at the Caelian door saddling an argument with a wine carter.

“Young master,” he says. “The street is an arrangement the whole mistress admires.”

“I am not coming in.” Marcus shows the folded letter. No seal. His name in full on the outside, a nakedness of address that makes the sight of it almost indecent. “For Prima. At her own house, if that is right. Not at the guild. Not at dinner anywhere. If she won’t take it, bring it back.”

Barbatus looks at the letter and then, more significantly, at Marcus’s hands, which are performing less than they once did. “And the fee.”

“My cloak strap is broken.”

“It is now, maybe. A strap and a delivery. Mended by the house needlewoman at trade rates. Unless the young master wants his messages travelling like his family used to: unnamed, at other people’s charges.”

Marcus hands over the cloak with the air of a man paying a small tax to become a citizen of the real. “Tell her—”

“No.” Barbatus takes the letter carefully, as if it were a sword being handed edge-first by someone who has recently learned not to wave it. “Letters do their own telling. That’s what the figures with the ink invented them for.”

At home the announcement of the Syrian appointment is received with a discipline that would have impressed a legion. Onesimus carries the official summary on a tray, as if bad news also benefits from crockery. Lentulus reads it standing, gives no speech, and asks whether the kitchen knows Marcus will be late. This is so far from the expected senatorial response that the steward reports a quietness, a word the household runs on for two days like an emergency ration.

Servilia waits until evening. She finds her husband not among the masks—that would be the old theatre—but in the workroom where aqueduct returns are being copied in several hands, competently, into duplicates meant to survive both fire and vanity.

“Do you want condolence in the northern manner,” she asks, “or shall I have a district flooded so that you can be needed beautifully?”

“Are those the options in our marriage now?”

“They are the ones with paperwork.”

He lays down a schedule. “I wanted it, Servilia. Let that be entered. I wanted the province, the army, the opportunity to be Gnaeus Cornelius Lentulus at a great distance from the evidence. Then the year happened at home. It is difficult to outsource a conscience once it has acquired local staff.”

She looks at the returns: channels, leaks, an arcade whose repair will cause a market gardener to correspond, a fountain pressure table annotated in Lentulus own hand. His writing has become smaller and more legible. She has never mentioned noticing.

“The appointment will give the baths three days,” she says. “Then Hadrian will praise a building and the public interest will put on sandals. What will you do on the fourth day?”

“Inspect a settling tank.”

“Then we are not ruined.”

It is so close to tenderness that both look elsewhere. Servilia picks up one of the copies and points to a figure. “This is wrong.”

“It is an estimate.”

“It is wrong in the optimistic direction, which in a husband used to be called policy.”

“Correct it.”

“I beg your pardon?”

“You have the pen in all but furniture, in this house. Correct it.”

She does. The clerk, who has gone very still, later tells Onesimus that Rome ended quietly in a workroom and nobody bothered to notify the provinces. Onesimus instructs him to forget at the professional standard. The figure remains corrected.

Acilius’s letter to Athens is a masterpiece of the second column. It reports that Gnaeus Cornelius Lentulus has accepted heavy responsibility for the city’s water; that his health, though not delicate, no longer invites provinces to compete for it; that the famous drafting hand is now employed on estimates whose consequences can be tasted. It suggests, without saying, that a man who has stopped applying for exile in the form of honour may be of more use to an emperor designing a reign than another polished governor with a clean procession of secrets.

Lentulus sees the copy because Acilius, who is old and honest in the expensive way, sends it entire. “You make me sound like a ladle,” he says.

“You should hear yourself in other people’s versions. Half of them have you building a temple to freedwomen, which even I think hasty before lunch.”

They are walking after a hearing through a porticoed street where petitioners cluster like weather at a temple. A freedwoman with a folder under her arm is arguing cheerfully with a Secretary. The word clause crosses the marble at a distance. Lentulus does not turn. The discipline pleases Acilius.

“Hadrian will remember you,” he says.

“That is not necessarily the mercy it advertises itself as.”

“No emperor’s memory is. But it is better than being remembered only by column height.”

In the Forum, work on the frieze is high now above readable distance. Figures climb and fall around the shaft in a sequence designed by men who assume posterity owns ladders. Lentulus and Acilius stand for a moment with other hereditary spectators, heads back, mouths not quite open because they have been trained by ancestry to congratulate the future without looking hungry.

“I used to think that was how to survive,” Lentulus says.

“What, spiral?”

“To keep telling the same story upward until nobody could ask whose hands did the carrying.”

Acilius watches a crane’s rope take the weight. Men shout in several provinces. “You are becoming a difficult companion at monuments, Gnaeus. Your conversation is all underneath things.”

“I have had a year of plumbing.”

“Write that to Athens.”

“I shall let you. My hand has caused enough provincial correspondence.”

They walk on towards a district where a fountain is failing. At the corner, a news-seller cries an inaccurate summary of appointments, embroidered with titles that may not survive the afternoon. The Syrian appointee’s name comes second in the list and attracts no theatrical attention whatsoever. It is, Lentulus notices, almost possible to hear his own prospects becoming history, and history is quieter than ambition expected.

There is one public humiliation still to metabolise, of the small daily kind by which empires teach disappointment to sit up straight. At a dedication of a repaired basin near the Praeneste road, a local magistrate begins by praising the emperor, proceeds through the Senate and arrives at the curator with a phrase clearly designed by a rival: “Gnaeus Cornelius Lentulus, whose eastern hopes have been so usefully domesticated—”

A silence the size of the basin follows. The water runs. It is very clear.

Lentulus rises from the magistrate’s borrowed chair and thanks the contractors by name. He thanks the women of the fountain association—there is no association, and now, because a senator has said it on a public morning, there may have to be—for keeping the queue orderly while pressure was restored. He thanks the engineer last, which is either humility or accurate billing. He does not mention Syria. The magistrate’s phrase dies in the sunlight for lack of a wound willing to carry it.

Marcus, in attendance because Servilia has decided heirs should see dignity done without cavalry, watches an old retainer of his father’s weep fractionally into a cup. “They used to cheer,” the old man says.

Marcus looks at the fountain, where children have already resumed the national sport of getting wet in defiance of garments. “They are cheering. The instrumentation has changed.”

Afterward Lentulus is shown the inscription proposed for the arcade: small, as promised, but with his full tria nomina doing their ancient semaphore. He asks for the engineer’s name to be given the same size. The clerk says this is not customary. The engineer says it is unnecessary. The market gardener whose beans survived negotiations says if names are being distributed at a useful size, the fountain women would like their neighbourhood spelled correctly, as it is wrong on two official maps.

By the time the party rides home, the inscription includes a corrected locality. It is a triumph so minor that Rome’s historians would have to break their style to record it. Lentulus finds that he can live unrecorded at this scale. The water can be heard from the road behind them, doing the oldest public work of all: arriving where people need it without asking for applause in Greek.

By the time the next letters come from the east, the theatre of expectation has changed its programme. Hadrian's name is now pronounced less as a rumour of the future and more as a climate other men are learning to plan roofs for. Acilius sends Lentulus a paragraph, copied out whole rather than summarised: an approval, cool but exact, of curators who attend to the city's arteries, and a sentence about laws being most Roman when they allow the state to know where its own pressure is being stolen.

"Does he mean me?" Lentulus asks.

"He means Hadrian," Acilius writes in the margin. "Do not let it inflate the pipes."

Lentulus reads it twice in the study, with the dented mirror on the desk and a fresh aqueduct schedule beneath it. Once, access to an emperor's marginal mind would have been the whole object: a sign that the house still stood in the main current. Now the sentence matters to him for a different reason. Somewhere in the elegant machinery of an accomplished collector of worlds, the pressure metaphor has found the same broken channel that freedwomen, clerks and fountain women have been reporting at human scale.

He writes back three lines. No more. He thanks Acilius, declines to interpret imperial weather as a personal province, and reports that a leak near the Praeneste road has been found by the testimony of women who time their mornings by it. Then he takes the three lines to Servilia for inspection, an act that would once have required a civil war to extract.

She changes one adjective. "Steady," she says, "not loyal. Athens will know the difference and charge accordingly."

He copies the letter again in his own hand. The hand is smaller now. It no longer reaches the edge of the page as if the margin were a frontier to be personally suppressed.

Outside, the column continues upward under its scaffolding, the war becoming architecture at a steady rate. Somewhere below it, the city's less visible works are proceeding at the speed of maintenance: a repaired pipe, a corrected figure, a letter answered in Latin. History, if it is watching at all, has stopped demanding that every meaningful event come with a statue on top.

■

Prima reads it at her table, twice, with the baker's bread cooling beside her in rows like the Forum's columns, and then, as advised, puts it with her tools. She writes back in Latin without a single Greek word in it, four lines: that she is well; that the shop will bake for the guild feast; that he is not to give her sister Cornelia messages he lacks the standing to deliver; and that if he wishes to be kin — she has the word from Daphne by now, the plumbing having delivered that too, disreputably and clean — he can begin by doing nothing where her name is spoken at his family's table, noisily, for about nineteen years. "After that," the letter ends, "we will see what the figures say. It is apparently the family poetry."

The letter reaches Prima in the bakery yard because Barbatus, who understands borders, stops there rather than carrying Palatine ink into the fullers' house by any threshold that might be made to testify. He has changed out of Caelian door livery, insofar as a man of his weather can be said to wear anything but himself. He gives the folded paper to Titus first—not its contents, its existence—as one man warning another of a load coming through a narrow gate.

"From the young master," he says. "No seal. Says if she won't take it, it comes back to him unopened and nobody has spent her."

Titus, who has flour to one elbow and a wedding being urban-planned by his mother, looks at the letter as at an unfamiliar tool. "Is that the custom in great houses?"

"It is this year. Customs are weakening nobly all over the city."

Prima has come from the house with a bowl of water for the outdoor basin. She sees the name on the outside. The yard continues—ovens breathing, a cart being coaxed, Mother Livia somewhere issuing a fatwa on bench placement—but inside the circle of the three of them a smaller Rome forms: letter, messenger, betrothed, recipient.

"I'll take it," Prima says. She dries her hands first. Barbatus notices and files it under generalship.

Titus does not ask to read it. He does not ask later, either, which is why, after she has read it twice at her own table, Prima tells him the shape of it herself. Not every line. Enough that no third party can later rearrange him into a narrator without documents.

"He says he is learning grammar," she says. "I am considering my fees."

"Charge them in advance. That family has a history."

She writes the reply on paper bought for the trousseau lists, then copies it onto better paper when she sees that her first hand has made kin look like a price tag. It is not a long letter. Long letters, she has decided, are what men write when they hope the recipient will do the work of summary on their behalf. Hers does its own.

Mother Livia finds her at it during the bread's second rising. "You are writing in the careful hand," she says. "Who is to be governed?"

"Marcus."

"Good. Govern briefly. Men retain more." She does not lean to read. Mother Livia's respect takes the form of not putting her experienced shadow between a woman and fresh ink. "And after he has it?"

"Nothing is owed except the baking."

"Mark that down as peace."

Barbatus returns in the late afternoon for the mended cloak strap. The reply is folded, unsealed in its turn, which appears to strike him as a fine piece of return fire. "Any message to be said around it?"

"No."

"Letters do their own telling," he says, satisfied. "I had it from an unreliable source."

Barbatus delivers the answer at the Palatine’s garden gate, not the atrium door, because a man can spend twenty years in service and still develop new specialisms. Marcus is there at the appointed hour in travelling clothes for a journey of forty paces back into his own house. The folded paper has no seal. It has only his name on it, written in a hand that makes no attempt to enchant him.

He does not open it on the street. He takes it to his room and reads it by the window over the garden, twice. The first time he reads for what is forbidden; the second for what is permitted, which is less and therefore more.

Nineteen years of doing nothing, noisily. He hears her say it in the tone of the dining room, when she was only a needlewoman who had done the unforgivable thing of being his family at him in public without papers. It is not condemnation. It is an estimate. Do the work at your own table, where no one can applaud you for it.

He goes down to dinner and behaves with such ordinary moderation that Servilia becomes alert. Lentulus, too, can see an unopened weather system at the table. Neither asks. The discipline is still new enough to be felt, like shoes before they take the shape of governing.

Afterwards Marcus knocks at his father’s study. Knock: another novelty. Lentulus looks up from a report on a fountain that has opinions.

“She wrote back,” Marcus says.

“I see.”

“Four lines. In Latin.” He smiles before he can arrest the development. “No Greek, Father. It is possible I have been overpaying for sincerity by the syllable.”

“A family weakness. We are reducing imports.”

“Am I to answer?”

Lentulus looks towards the desk where a fresh sheet had once covered a draft. “What does the letter say about the future?”

“It leaves the figures for later.”

“Then perhaps the answer is time.”

Marcus has no counter-proposal fit to be minuted. On his way out he pauses in the corridor, where the masks have had another season of being cleaned into surreal attentiveness. He says to the one whose face most resembles his own impatience: “Nothing, then. Noisily.”

Onesimus, passing below with a lamp, hears and forgets correctly. The household decides within hours that the young master has indeed become religious, though the cult appears to involve cups left unfinished for reasons no priest has yet been able to retail.

Barbatus tells it at the Caelian three days later, because doors have their own postal service and he has never seen the point in charging for air. He tells it in the courtyard while a carter is being unloaded and Eirene is close enough to audit metaphors. His version has a gate, a cup neither accepted too soon nor left meaningfully full, and Marcus saying “nothing, noisily” to a corridor.

“That last bit,” Eirene says, “you have improved.”

“A story should be paid in kind.”

Antonia hears the shape of it while going through the linen-room invoices for Tuesday. She does not ask Barbatus what the letters said. He would not know; more importantly, Prima has not told her, and Antonia is not going to install a customs office between a girl and her first family correspondence. Certain doors in this new arrangement are opened only from the side where the girl stands.

On Tuesday Prima arrives with summer estimates and a strip of braid she dislikes so intelligently that Diomedes has to sit down. Nothing in her manner advertises a letter. The work proceeds. The soup policy is observed without being named. Then, over a torn length that has belonged for years to the practice basket and will probably outlive the Republic, she says: “He wrote well enough.”

Antonia’s hands continue. This is the entire reward of practice baskets.

“Did he?”

“Less Greek than threatened. I wrote back in Latin. It seemed only fair to charge in a currency he can count.”

“And has Rome fallen?”

“The ovens are functioning.” Prima ties off the practice seam. “I told him not to tell Cornelia anything he cannot carry.”

“It is an expensive family, theirs, for messages.”

“They keep trying to send people instead.” The sentence, offered without ceremony, goes into the room like a measured length. Antonia wants to warn her, praise her, invoice the centuries. Instead she picks up the braid whose colour has just been condemned and says: “Then we shall charge by the piece, Prima, and keep the thread an honest red.”

Prima gives the laugh—wry, brief, her own—that no longer needs to be checked against anyone's attic. “You sound like my mother when she approved of something and meant to deny it later.”

“I shall take that as a reference from the senior management.”

“Take it as a warning. She counted everything twice.”

“Then we are safe at the second count.”

Marcus keeps this letter in the scroll-case under his grandfather's mask, in the sticking cupboard, where sealed tablets ripen. The household, which thinks in plumbing, decides that the young master has become religious. Servilia, who knows the cupboard's exact inventory of the century, instructs no one about it at all. The masks look down. One day, Antonia reflects when the story completes its migration to the Caelian — by way of Barbatus, who tells it as a fight he once saw in which nobody died, the rarest kind he knows — one day someone will open all the cupboards of that family at once, and the smell of old wax and newer ink will describe Rome better than the column will, whatever height it reaches.

Chapter Twenty-Three

The Vintage

. . .

The vintage comes to Campania like a debt falling due: men in the rows before light, the presses, the year's whole borrowed weather turned suddenly, crushingly, into fact. Antonia goes south in the autumn on the Greek's business that is her business — an investor is entitled to inspect an olive grove, indeed to taste its grievances — travelling with Diomedes and a mule-driver whose opinions on emperors would constitute treason in any province not hardened by long exposure to mule-drivers. She has not been back to Baiae in twenty-one years. The road insists on reminders the way roads do: a hillside town climbed by steps; a well-dressed girl at a fountain holding, steady as a standard, a tray that is absolutely a mirror.

Diomedes has arranged the journey with his usual respect for the fact that bodies age less forgivingly than reputations. They travel in stages, by carriage where the road permits dignity and by mule cart where it permits progress. The driver, who introduces every emperor by the defects of the road built under him, regards Antonia’s tailored cloak with suspicion until she correctly identifies an approaching change in weather by the behaviour of smoke from a hillside kiln. After that he addresses her as an authority on the south and reserves his sedition for national topics.

“Trajan spends like a man putting his name where rain can read it,” he says. “Hadrian will travel like a man checking whether the ink dried.”

“Keep both hands on the reins,” Diomedes says. “Treason is easier to survive at a walk.”

Antonia watches Campania unroll with the business end of her mind doing sentry duty. There are villages white as knucklebones, black soil in patterns older than Rome’s paperwork, vines trained up trees in green marriages of convenience. There are also stairs: town stairs, shrine stairs, a flight beside a cistern down which girls carry amphorae with the economy of long sentencing. At one inn a servant brings a tray of cups up from a cellar and the past, having no manners, puts its foot on every step beside her.

She sleeps badly in a clean room. It offends her efficiency. She has slept soundly through taxation, death threats delivered by committee and a kitchen fire extinguished mostly in Greek. Here, southward weather gets into the shutters. She dreams not of Baiae exactly but of being counted by somebody else: coins, stairs, girls at a muster, all declining to stay in their columns.

Diomedes at breakfast says nothing and pours the watered wine himself. It is one of his liturgies. “The grove is two hours if the driver does not stop to assassinate geography.”

“And Baiae?”

“Visible from the upper terraces, madam. If required.”

“I am here to inspect olives, Diomedes.”

“Yes. And an institution is entitled to a view.”

She has decided en route what she will not do. She will not seek out the dealer’s successor to make an old office perform horror. She will not climb any staircase out of defiance, like a woman in a recitation. She will not, merely because her money now has a southern accent, ask the landscape for a signed confession. Ground is ground. People put the paperwork in.

And yet, at a fountain where they stop for the mules, she sees a girl of perhaps sixteen carrying a polished tray for a mistress in a litter. The girl’s face is shut like a well-kept shop. For one second Antonia’s own reflection crosses the tray’s bright metal, forty years old and on her way to inspect property, superimposed on a younger trade.

She looks away first. The girl does not need an ancestress appearing in the equipment.

“Drive on,” Antonia says.

The driver, who has been telling Diomedes about a cousin unofficially related to a man who once saw the emperor’s horse, climbs up with the air of a philosopher recalled to public life. “The coast makes everybody thoughtful, lady. It’s the salt. Preserves grievances past their season.”

“Then we shall invoice by weight,” Antonia says, and the cart goes on into the autumn light, which has the honesty of a debt finally presented in the correct office.

He is there because the vintage requires owners as well as creditors, and because the Greek, who has survived forty years by arranging rooms, has arranged for once a grove. Lentulus among his olives looks less like a senator than like a man auditing trees that have read his family's accounts for three centuries and remain, professionally, unimpressed. The agent does the talking. The Greek does the not-talking, in two languages. Antonia walks the terraces with the business end of her mind uppermost — drainage (poor, old the Roman way), trees (good), press (a disgrace she is already pricing) — and understands, with the part of her the business is protecting, that she has brought herself to this ground on purpose. The eyes do it, eventually. Cities can be filed. Ground cannot. This is her money's ground now, a useful share of it. It is also, in a book no Greek keeps, the ground she was sold south from: the muster, the contract, the south itself like a direction on a coffin.

The estate manager is a narrow man with a broad education in excuses. He begins, as managers do, with what cannot be controlled: rain at the wrong grandfather’s hour, a caterpillar with provincial ambitions, a south wind that has been reading Greek and become changeable. Antonia listens at the level of drainage. The Greek listens at the level of debt. Diomedes listens at the level of what has not been said about labour.

An older worker is summoned because nobody else can explain why one terrace yields like a psalm and the next like a tax demand. He is introduced as Soter, though whether this is the name his mother gave him or the estate settled on for record purposes is left for another reformation. He takes them to a retaining wall and shows where water has been going quietly wrong for ten years.

“Gentlemen station trees,” he says. “Water enlists where it likes.”

Lentulus, arriving along the path with dust on his shoes, hears this and does not correct the politics. It is a measure of his year. “Can it be cut back without losing the wall?”

“Can be persuaded. More hands before the rain. Fewer stones after.”

“Cost?”

The manager has a tablet ready with a figure that has been dieting. Antonia points to a column. “That assumes your tenants lend tools and call it loyalty.”

“They have always—”

“Then they have always been charged twice.”

The Greek’s silence becomes floral. Diomedes opens a page like a drawbridge. For the next hour the grove is not a symbol but an organisation: who eats during harvest; which press house roof leaks; whose son is being promised seasonal work in a dialect that differs from his contract; what the olives will fetch if the Greek’s ships take them at the October price rather than the November quarrel.

Lentulus follows better than his manager expects. Water board habits travel: ask where the pressure goes, ask who says so, ask what happens at the lower end of the system when the upper villas take their full share. Soter, having delivered his diagnosis, watches a senator being tutored by a freedman in estate Greek and a woman whose name is on the new paper. His expression suggests that the republic may yet become educational.

At the oldest tree on the terrace—trunk like twisted rope, branches seasoned by catastrophe—they stop. Somebody’s ancestor is said to have planted it before the convenient centuries. Antonia puts her hand to the bark briefly, not sentimentally. Living things are indifferent to her bookkeeping. That is one of their recommendations.

“It should be left out of the highest yield estimate,” she says. “Old trees object to optimism.”

“It has been estimated hopefully for twenty years,” Lentulus says. “A family policy.”

“Then we are diversifying.”

The joke lands in the open air, where nobody makes it into a myth. Below, the presses begin again, a rhythm like Rome clearing its throat. The manager takes his corrected tablet away with the fragile expression of a man who has just learned that debt may come with women attached and questions in their own handwriting.

“The press wants replacing before next year,” she says, because she came to say things that could be minuted. “Whoever holds the paper after this vintage should insist on it, or the yield will file its own report.”

“The marriage has paid the Greek's first significance.” Lentulus picks an olive, not ripe, and puts it in his mouth anyway, either from habit or penance; the bitterness crosses his face like weather. “The remainder — you are being paid, Antonia. At the full rate. I wanted you to hear the estate say so with its mouth full.”

“I hear quarterly. It is my civic religion; you may have read of it.” She looks down the terraces to where the sea does its old indifferent glitter, Baiae-ward. “I climbed stairs down there for two years with water that weighed more than I did, by the end of the summers. I own paper on your trees now. If a poet of my acquaintance wrote it he'd be sent back to the kitchen for saffron abuse.”

They eat at the press house rather than in the villa, because Diomedes has understood that Antonia would rather inspect soup where it is made than genealogy where it is polished. The meal is harvest food: bread with density, greens bitter enough to tell the truth, oil from a pressing good enough to make the Greek’s agent briefly close his eyes in a manner not permitted in his contract.

Workers come and go at the lower table. Nobody pretends the proprietors are not in the room; nobody performs a festival about it either. Campania in vintage has no leisure for Roman theatre. A woman with juice to the elbows tells the manager that the old press has begun to sing in its beam, which nobody at the table translates into optimism.

"Sing how?" Lentulus asks.

"Like a tooth about to give evidence," she says.

"Cost of replacement?"

She looks at the manager. The manager looks at the Greek. The Greek looks, in two languages, at his hands.

Antonia says, "We have discussed the press. It is being replaced. Talk about the beam as if it were machinery and not a relative."

It gets a laugh from the lower table because she has not tried to buy one. Released from metaphor, the beam's defects are enumerated with satisfying brutality. A carpenter is named. A timber source is argued. Soter suggests the old beam can be cut for vineyard props, which gives the object a future in humility.

After the meal, while Diomedes is annexing information under the guise of admiring storage jars, Antonia walks with the Greek between the ranks of amphorae. The banker's sandals make almost no sound.

"You have arranged more than a grove," she says.

"I have arranged an inspection. What the inspected parties make of the weather belongs to their accounts."

"Diomedes says your small room has enlarged itself into landscape."

"Diomedes is a poet with a filing system."

She stops by an amphora sealed and marked for Rome. Her name is not on it. Her money, through channels respectable enough to be boring, is. "When I first came south," she says, "I was cargo."

The Greek does not give her a proverb. It is why she trusts him. "Paper improves with the bearer, madam."

"Paper burns."

"Then we keep copies." He inclines his head towards the terraces where Lentulus is standing with the manager over a drain. "He pays on the day."

"I know."

"He has stopped asking for the statements to be made smaller."

That is, from the Greek, a character reference with artillery. Antonia accepts it at face value and no more. A man paying on the day is not a moonrise. Still, a calendar in this family has changed its phases.

“Do not bring Prima into the estate paper,” she says.

“I could not without instructions in her own hand.”

“And if she ever gives them?”

“Then a new room will be required.” The banker's face does not move, but something around his eyes can be filed as approval. “Rooms are a specialism.”

A whistle sounds below. Doves change trees as if disgusted by economics. The Greek returns to silence, leaving the landscape to conduct its own negotiations in the open.

Before the afternoon inspection resumes, Antonia does the thing she decided en route she would not do, but she does it under house rules. She walks with Diomedes to the upper path where Baiae can be seen—not entered, not indicted, seen. The town lies along its curve in a glitter of roofs and steam and famous idleness. It is smaller than memory, as capitals of suffering usually are when approached with account books.

Diomedes stops one pace behind. He has made a profession of distances.

“There was a house with blue tiles,” Antonia says. “Behind the dealer’s rooms. Stairs down to water. A woman with henna on her nails who could make soup out of threats.”

“Would you like the house located, madam?”

“No.”

“Would you like it purchased and put to some humiliating civic use?”

“Diomedes.”

“I ask for operational clarity. Revenge has procurement implications.”

She looks at the coast for longer than a view can be held responsible for. Somewhere down there a girl learned that standing up was compulsory because the arithmetic of lying down included disappearance. Somewhere down there a report was coined and spent upward into better houses. The girl is not down there any longer. She is here, with a Greek’s strongbox behind her and a daughter across a river who charges by the piece. The knowledge does not make the town innocent. It removes its right to be the final address.

“I would like our oil taken by the easier road,” she says. “Not through Baiae. It adds two days and saves the jars.”

Diomedes accepts the instruction as if no one has been standing at a border of the underworld discussing logistics. “The inland route is less scenic and more solvent.”

“Then it is the family route.”

They walk back to the grove. Whatever has been laid at the coast remains there, unsentimental as ballast. Antonia does not feel healed, a word she regards as a cosmetic for ledgers. She feels oriented, which is rarer and can be used in weather.

The vintage does not pause for the moral improvements of ownership. By the third day the press house is running at a tempo that makes conversation sound like a hobby of the underemployed. Baskets come in from first light: grapes for wine from the lower parcels, olives still early but judged by men who can hear ripeness in a branch. Antonia takes a turn with the tally because Diomedes is needed at the store tally and because nobody, including Antonia, can be trusted to stand in a workplace merely radiating investment.

She counts aloud in her Caelian office voice and then, when a young worker corrects her by a basket, corrects the total without the ownership grimace. It wins her more in the press house than six amphorae of fine feeling. The woman who diagnosed the beam says, “You count like someone has counted you.”

“It gives the numbers manners,” Antonia says.

Soter is everywhere at once, as older men are during harvests, mostly by having convinced the young that he sees around corners. He tells Lentulus which terrace to leave unpicked until the moon changes the sugar, tells the manager not to shout at the mules in Latin they despise, tells a boy that a ladder is not a relative and should not be leaned on for emotional support.

Lentulus watches his estate being run by people whose surnames, if they have them, are not on his maps. “I have owned this since I was twenty,” he says to Antonia during a lull no longer than a swallow.

“You have received reports since you were twenty.”

“Is that distinction also plumbing?”

“It is drainage. Authority should visit the lower ground before it signs.”

He goes down to the lower terrace to look at Soter’s proposed cut and returns with mud on his calves and the news that the drainage crew should start after the press beam is taken out, not during peak movement of baskets. “Otherwise the path becomes an argument,” he explains.

“You are improving the estate in the order of the evening. We may make a manager of you at slave rates.”

“Madam,” the Greek says from the amphorae, without appearing to have arrived, “the paper has a phrase for that.”

“Do not say it here,” Diomedes tells him. “The beam has suffered enough.”

On the way between grove and posting inn there is a town she has not named in her accounts for years. Diomedes has given the driver no instruction to stop, which is how Antonia knows he expects her to give one. The cart passes a laundry court where steam rises in disciplined weather. A woman at the gate is haranguing a dyer with the fluency of long financial intimacy. The voice reaches the road before the face does.

“Stop,” Antonia says.

The woman turns. Time has worked with its usual mixture of cruelty and editorial restraint: the hands are dyed permanently at the fingertips, the hair is iron, the eye is the same one that once asked for a loan to redeem tools from a brother-in-law and paid in wool and gossip. She looks at Antonia, then at the good cloak, then at the Greek’s not quite visible influence around the cart like good weather for banks.

“You,” she says. “You kept growing.”

“So did the business.” Antonia gets down carefully, because the gesture must not become a descent from a monument. “Your tools?”

“Mine. His yard too, since the fever. Heaven operates at retail.” She calls into the court, where two younger women are working the rinse, “This is the lady who thinks a loan is a sentence with the interest where you can see it. Attend, and don’t borrow from priests.”

There is wine in a back room with accounts on the wall in chalk. The old borrower—whose name in Antonia’s oldest informal book was followed, she remembers, by pays in colour—has become a lender herself, in sums so small official Rome would trip over them. She shows the chalk without showing off. “Mostly tools. One wedding, which I regret as a category. A widow’s stall. No sermons. I took the wording off you.”

“Did you?” Antonia says, and finds the afternoon rearranging itself with more than estate drains in it.

“I took the part where you wrote what I owed where I could read it in daylight. It ruined me for men with folders.” The woman wipes a cup dry and gives her the better one without noticing, or perhaps noticing exactly. “Your Senate clause came through here in the summer with a copyist. Half price. We put it over the gate. The priests said it weathered badly.”

“Paper burns,” Antonia says.

“We keep the ash in a jar as a warning and copies in the strongbox.” She grins, dyed fingers around her cup. “You own olives now, they say.”

“Paper on olives.”

“Paper grows if you don’t give it to brothers-in-law.”

They do not embrace. South of Rome, among women who have made it through, sentiment often inspects the premises instead: drainage (good), younger women (learning), away to her cart by a girl with indigo up to the wrist and a directness Antonia respects at once.

“Is the lady coming into the yard?” the girl asks.

"The lady," says the proprietress, "is going back to Rome to register the world. It takes it out of a person."

It is not a blessing. It is better: a former debtor regarding her as a colleague in an occupation no committee has yet learned to name.

■

"I have thought—" he begins, and stops, because what he has thought has taken him nine months to come down to this terrace to say without a committee to hold it. The presses groan below. A overseer's whistle, somebody's laugh, doves. "I have thought a man should be able to apologise in the order of the evening, too. Not the questions. Yours would be unanswerable at my rates."

"Then in the order of the evening," Antonia says, and folds her hands, and lets him.

He tells it. The muster. The study smelling of wax. The question asked once; the statesman's sentence accepted; twenty years marching with a stone in the shoe and calling the limp a style. He tells it without the Senate in it, which for Lentulus is nakedness beyond any baths. He does not say the word love because they are forty and the word has been taxed out of their bracket; he says I let my father choose the currency, which in Cornelian is the same confession with the ancestry left in.

He begins badly, because men of his training do. "When my father—" he says, and hears the opening arrange three centuries in front of him like furniture. He stops. Looks down at his hands, which have olive dust in the creases and are not, for once, holding a document up to the light. "No. When I came into that study. He was there. I keep putting him in the sentence so that I can stand behind the name."

Antonia does not help him. Help, at this stage, would be another form of service.

"I asked whether there was a child," he says. "Not whether she lived. Not where. Not what your name was on the contract, or who held the paper, or what Baiae meant in money and stairs. I asked a question that could be answered by grammar. He gave me one, and I paid for my whole life with the savings. That is the muster, Antonia. I never left it. I just learned to march indoors."

A press groans lower down. Somebody laughs at a dropped tool. It is indecent how intact the afternoon remains.

"I received a world in which you had been filed. I improved my application to it. I married—Servilia deserves her own sentence and will, I hope, one day write it—into the arrangement his settlement bought. When Marcus was born I thought: the account balances. I did not know it was balanced by giving another child to a woman counting stairs in Transtiberim. If I had known—" Again he catches the conditional doing its elegant smuggling. "I do not know what I would have done. That is part of the apology, though it is not an attractive part. I would like to tell you I would have burned the house down. The boy who was at that muster liked being a Cornelius more than he liked being accurate."

"I know," Antonia says. "I saw the boy."

It is not absolution. It is evidence, and he takes it as a man takes a bitter olive from his own tree—without pretending to be nourished by theatre.

"I have paid what can be paid in money because money was the language in which I could not pretend to be misunderstood. The clause—" He almost smiles, stops, resumes with a citizen's care. "The clause was written because I had seen a room of women who could not make refusal legible and, for one dawn, I recognised the plumbing of my own life in it. Other people have made it real. Prima—" The name remains difficult, not as a scandal but as a weight he has no licence to lift. "Prima owes me nothing. Not a letter. Not a dynasty. If she never writes my name, I will take that as a text accurately delivered."

"You may be cross-examined in another year. Not her betrothal winter, not her wedding season. She decides."

"I am learning."

"You are reciting."

“Is there a difference in our families?”

“One of them signs.”

He stands in the terraces he has inherited and is learning, late, to inspect at ground level. “I am sorry,” he says at last, without committees. “Not as a settlement. As a fact to be entered where you keep such things.”

Antonia hears the sorting of twenty years: stairs counted, money stopped, a girl folding linen with knowledge in her hands. “I keep facts by whether they can be used without spending the person they describe,” she says. “We will see.”

Antonia listens the way she listens to men after the fish course: for the truth under the arrangement. It is there. It has the unsatisfying shape of truth, which does not unlock rooms or unclimb stairs. It merely stops charging interest at the moment of its payment, and not an hour before.

“You were twenty-four,” she says at last. “I have Marcus's measure now; I know what your family's twenty-four is worth in the market. I was seventeen and unpaid, which is a different currency, and no apology is legal tender for it anywhere in this empire. So we will not pretend. The money is settled quarterly. The girl is settled better than money. The clause —” she pauses, and finds, to her housekeeping soul's surprise, something approaching warmth available, unbolted, between the quarters “— the clause is walking about Rome in other women's hands, Lentulus, doing what no apology of yours could stock. If a Cornelius must pay his debts, I will let the record show he paid in infrastructure.”

“Aqueducts and adverbs,” he says, with the first unguarded smile she has seen on him since a courtyard she does not visit. “My grandfather is revolving in his mask.”

There is, in the wake of it, an interval in which neither has a professional reason to remain on that terrace. The manager is waiting at a diplomatic distance with a tablet. The Greek is not waiting at all, which means he has anticipated the next three hours and is probably improving them in another language. Diomedes has become absorbed in the number of amphorae, an absorption Antonia recognises as mercy.

“Cornelia writes that her floor complains,” Lentulus says, because ordinary ground has to be tested after confessional weather. “It appears to be an asset. Her husband has had it re-laid in the music room and keeps the complaint under the stairs, as a souvenir.”

“She sings?”

“She directs. Avidius pays the master before he pays certain relatives. The harbour calls it romance; Servilia calls it scheduling.”

“And Marcus?” Antonia asks, and hears how easily the circuit completes itself: young people distributed among adults like weather reports.

“Marcus is learning that a reply is not a campaign. He has taken up aqueduct Greek—gradient, pressure, leakage—and applies it to the family at dinner in ways his mother corrects.”

“Prima wrote four lines.”

“So I have been informed at third hand, through plumbing and a doorkeeper’s sense of theatre.” He picks up a fallen olive and puts it down without tasting it this time. Progress can be small and still be entered. “I have not read them.”

“Good.”

“I thought you might prefer direct evidence.”

“I prefer no trespass. It photographs better in the third book.”

The phrase surprises a real smile from him and, more dangerously, something like gratitude. Antonia refuses delivery by turning to practicalities: the press beam, Soter’s drainage crew, the autumn payment schedule, a clause in the estate papers ensuring seasonal workers are not made to lend tools as a feudal courtesy.

“You would incorporate my sentence into an olive estate,” Lentulus says.

“I would incorporate a receipt,” Antonia says. “The sentence has other employment.”

“Refusals, legible, among trees.”

“Do not let it go to the family head. A clause in an orchard is still only as good as the manager’s handwriting.”

He calls the manager over. Terms are amended on the tablet in the open air—not as moral legislation, which would require trumpets and a committee, but as line items. Tool hire paid. Harvest food uncharged. A woman in the press house to be named on the stores tally by her own name, not as her husband's portable labour. Soter, summoned to witness drainage, hears this and regards the sky as if it were a document he is checking for forgery.

"The seasons will notice us less if we stop charging them rent," he says.

It is the best political speech of the autumn. Antonia watches Lentulus make no move to own it.

"Your grandfather is filing it. Masks can't move; that's their whole tragedy and your family's business model." She turns back toward the presses, the agent, the Greek's beautiful silences. "Replace the press, Lentulus. Your olives deserve machinery that isn't a metaphor. So, if we are itemising, do your children. All —" she lets the plural stand on the terrace in the autumn light — at length, in the open, between the press and the sea "— of them."

That evening, in the villa's plainest room—which Lentulus now uses because the grand dining room smells of three centuries of applause—they sign the estate amendments. The documents are read aloud by Diomedes because Antonia insists and because the manager's voice tends to soften difficult numerals. Tool hire. Harvest food. Press replacement to begin when the vintage allows. A reserve for drainage. The press-house tally to carry women's names where women have done the work, for payment purposes, a phrase which in Rome can revolutionise heaven if left in a dull enough hand.

The woman from the press house is present for her line. She signs with a mark and then, surprising everyone except Soter, writes her initials under it in letters learned from a son who had a season with a travelling grammarian. "For payment purposes," she repeats, and makes it sound like a door.

Lentulus signs. Antonia signs. The Greek witnesses in the signature that has probably survived better governments. There is no applause. In the courtyard someone is washing a cart and singing a song about a mule with political opinions.

When the others have gone, Lentulus remains looking at the duplicate. “My father would have called this sentimentality with accountants.”

“Your father called many invoices character when he wanted them cheaper.”

“He did.” He lays the document flat under his hand, not as a seal but as a table thing. “When Cornelia asks—” He cannot yet put the afternoon visit, the apology or the plural into an order fit for a daughter who has her own music room. “When Servilia tells her, she may come to the Caelian.”

“She may come to a house that serves the public by appointment.” Antonia’s face does not change. “If she asks for me, Lentulus, it will be in her own hand. If she asks for her sister, that is Prima’s house and Prima’s door. I do not open it with your key.”

“No.” The word is immediate. Good. “No. I only wished to say the family will not send her as a message.”

“Your family is becoming positively postal. Letters, replies, refusals entered.”

“It is the new plumbing.”

“Then mind your pressure.” She takes her copy. Diomedes has already made a second. Rome can proceed with civilisation in duplicate.

Before she leaves the estate, the Greek places one more document on the table. It is not an amendment. It is a sealed instruction, to be held in his office against the possibility that Prima herself one day wants evidence of the terms under which the money moved and the olive paper began.

“No names are to be exhibited,” he says. “No use may be made of it without her hand. If she never asks, it becomes ash at the direction of your estate.”

Lentulus looks at the seal. “A cupboard, with discipline.”

“A room,” the Greek says, “of the smaller kind.”

Antonia turns the document once but does not open it. She knows exactly what this restraint costs Lentulus, who has begun the year with a family talent for staging the opening of cupboards and calling the smell history. “Prima has papers of her own,” she says. “Guild, oven, commission accounts. This is only if the day comes when she wants the joinery inspected.”

“Then the joinery waits,” Lentulus says. “Quarterly.”

“Now you are becoming fluent.” She returns the sealed sheet to the Greek. “Enter it where no son with a metaphor can find it by romance.”

“The office has a drawer for poetry-proof items.”

Diomedes, who has been making a final inventory of amphorae count agree with itself after three attempts, looks up. “By the staircase returns?”

“By the documents nobody is to be grateful for,” the Greek says. “A growing department.”

It settles something for Antonia that the apology could not. The future has been left unlocked from Prima’s side. No revelation is waiting with trumpets. Only a banker, a seal and a woman not yet in the room whose permission is, at last, structurally load-bearing.

They walk down between the trees at a proprietor's pace, two Romans in early middle age with a shared minority holding in each other's ruin and a settlement, finally, in the only currency that has ever cleared in this city: work done on the ground, in season, by name.

Chapter Twenty-Four

What the Column Shows

. . .

They dedicate the column the following May, and Rome, which has watched it climb for two years inside its scaffolding, receives the reveal the way it receives everything imperial: by first applauding the emperor and then, having discharged glory, getting on with the serious business of trying to read it. The frieze goes up and up in its spiral: bridges, camps, battles, surrenders, the emperor addressing, the emperor sacrificing, the emperor — carved at intervals close enough that a man at ground level can keep finding him like a heartbeat — while all around him the war happens to other, smaller people, who carry and build and burn and are carried. From the courtyard you can read the beginning and the high middle blurs. For the rest you would need to be a bird, or the architect, or dead and put up there in a pot of gold at the top, as they say the emperor's ashes will be: the one reader of his own war with a perfect view being history, which in Rome means property.

The scaffolding has been coming down for days in a reverse siege, plank by plank, until the city has become used to fragments: a bridge here, a deified shoulder there, a horse’s cannon bone doing more for morale in the market than several speeches. On the dedication morning the last screens come away under the supervision of men whose names will not be carved anywhere, and the crowd makes the sound crowds make when a veil and a building are removed in the same gesture.

It is, everyone agrees before they have seen half of it, magnificent. It is also impossible. Human necks were not designed by Apollodorus.

Vendors have positioned themselves with the strategic genius of barbarian kings. Water is being sold at column prices. Little clay spirals are available for children, inaccurate in every detail except cost. A guide with one eye and absolute pitch in misinformation is explaining to a party from Narbonensis that the emperor appears fifty-eight times, or fifty-nine if you count the sacrifice twice, a theological nuance he is charging extra to settle.

“Does he?” someone behind Antonia asks.

“Count,” says his wife, with the air of a woman who has been asking him to do so in other departments for years.

The priests do what priests do with imperial stone: make it less lonely at the top. Offerings smoke in the officially fragranced direction. A flute player in new sandals watches the conductor as if music were a series of doors opening at public expense. Somewhere on the opposite side, a soldier who served in one of the armies being commemorated is describing a river crossing to his grandson and pointing confidently at the wrong bridge. Neither child nor history appears damaged.

Antonia’s margin is arranged by the purple-dealer with the authority of a man who has kept a viewing privilege alive through four changes of fashion. He has brought a stool for a wife who declines it, cushions nobody admits to needing and shade at a price he waves away because debts, between their houses, have learned to arrive in more useful denominations.

“You chose the morning light,” Antonia says.

“I chose where rich men become silhouettes and ordinary people can see their shoes.” He considers the column with a tradesman’s eye for repetition. “Nice work at the bottom. After the tenth turn it becomes a rumour with masonry.”

“Rome is committed to optimism at altitude.”

“Rome is committed to selling hats. Half this crowd will leave with a neck like a question.”

Eirene, who has brought provisions against the possibility that empire may run long, unwraps bread with the secrecy of a minor cult. “If a god desired us to stand through dedications unfed,” she says, “he would have put kitchens in the Forum and charged admission.”

Antonia stands in the same margin she stood in for the Forum's dedication, veiled respectably, the purple-dealer still making room out of an old debt now refinanced by gratitude. But the company has reorganised itself around her the way water reorganises around a stone it has decided to keep. Eirene is at her elbow. Prima — married since the winter, in a baker's wife's good wool with her tools' dowry half converted to a share in the bakehouse oven — stands at the other, at a distance that family keeps in a crowd full of aediles: close enough for history, far enough for paperwork. Marcus, who has taken to being civil in public forums with the concentration of a man defusing his own youth, inclines his head to the party from across the contractor's wives with a discretion that costs him visibly and is therefore, by every moral the city runs on, nearly worth something. The baker Titus holds Prima's elbow the way men hold ladders, and looks up at the imperial spiral with his mouth open, counting.

Prima’s marriage, when it came after mourning, had been a model of the small town Mother Livia designed: benches in the right streets, guild witnesses fed before witnesses in the wrong mood could form a faction, papers read at a volume suitable for enemies. Titus had held a ladder for garlands and then stood under them looking as if the ceremony had been especially arranged to make use of his one reliable talent. Prima wore no saffron that could be described as a banner. She wore her best blue, a colour that deepened in low light and had at the hem, where nobody could inspect it without exposing their own intentions, one small flower with its petal count privately amended.

Now she wears the tailored plainness of a woman whose work is being commissioned by people who used to spell her name from a guild label. Her share in the oven is no longer a novelty other women discuss in her presence. It has become something much more satisfactory: uninteresting to say aloud and difficult to take away in practice. The tools are still hers. The order book is partly hers. The house has her mark in seams nobody sees unless the seams fail, which they have not yet been given cause to do.

Titus is calculating how many men with baskets it would take to feed the crowd if the dedication went wrong. It is his form of historical scholarship. “The army part I follow,” he says. “All those bridges. But they never carve who made the bread before the bridge. A man doesn’t cross a river on glory before breakfast.”

“They carve sacks,” Prima says. “Look third turn up. You can just see the carrying.”

“Sacks are not men.”

“They have men under them.”

“So has the empire.”

Marcus, across the wives and contractors, hears at least the shape of this because laughter from their little group crosses the formal lane. He does not turn too far. He has been taught this year—by letters, doorways and a mother with a fourth ledger in her voice—how to be present without arranging other people’s papers. He raises a cup of watered wine in the general direction of tradespeople, a gesture large enough to be civility and small enough not to be a claim. Prima inclines her head exactly the distance a customer is owed.

Afterwards Titus says, “He has improved.”

“He is learning to do nothing at public volume.”

“It sounds tiring.”

“It is his first trade.”

Antonia hears, and does not let her face make an entry. This is how it will be in crowds: daughter with husband and bread on her breath, son by another woman in the lane where names are expected, herself between them in a veil that says respectability and a position that says nothing history can read from the ground. Closeness, far enough for paperwork.

It should hurt more. Perhaps at other hours it does. In the morning light, with the column taking all available symbolism and Eirene distributing bread like a ration officer of the private empire, it feels strangely like a sum that knows its own columns.

“What can you see?” Prima asks him.

“The beginning. And men with baskets. There's always the men with baskets, if you look where the emperor isn't.”

Antonia looks where the emperor isn't. She is good at it; it has been her civic religion's other service. In the carved crowd at the column's base the stone has them all: auxilia in their foreign trousers, engineers, women with bundles at the edges of camps, the whole freight of an empire moving on the backs the inscription will not name. She thinks of the names in Diomedes third book, wax renewed quarterly so some histories melt; of a fuller and his wife keeping a child after the paying stopped being the reason; of a woman in the Subura reading a Claudian clause aloud to a lodging-house door; of every unpaid person holding the mirror steady at seventeen while the carving was done elsewhere. Rome will read this column the way it reads everything: from the bottom, getting tired. She does not hold it against the stone. Stone is only as honest as the height you let people read it from.

For Lentulus, the dedication is an exercise in attending his own century at a new altitude. He stands where senior men stand, hears the words for the emperor, feels in his shoulder the older war stirring like a clerk called by a wrong name. Around him the Syria conversation has finally exhausted its diminishing returns; the man who got the province has done nothing in public more exciting than depart competently, which history may reward with the inattention it usually reserves for functioning government.

Acilius leans towards him as the procession regroups. “Your water is mentioned with approval,” he murmurs, “by a man who never approves liquids before noon.”

“Hadrian?”

“Athens.”

“The city has become a person in your correspondence.”

“It saves postage.”

Servilia, on his other side, is looking not at the frieze but at the crowd margin where veils, children and provision baskets are doing a fuller empire. Lentulus knows the angle. He does not follow it with his eyes. That, too, is a discipline and—whatever the house across the hills may enter in its third book—an act of care.

“You are not seeking your column,” Servilia says, so low that only marriage can hear.

“I know where the hands are.”

She gives him the faintest of edits. “Do not make it literature.”

“I shall make it aqueducts.”

Postumus, ahead of them, is already making it literature for a priest whose chin-strap is doing the listening. The tale includes a bridge, a barbarian king and a remark by Trajan that improves every time Postumus crosses the same water. Servilia watches with the expression of a woman who has heard the Republic fall at dinner so often she could provide seating.

At one point Lentulus catches Marcus across the forum—son, heir, a young man who has gone in eighteen months from a doorway nuisance to someone other people now ask for when a matter requires the appearance of not being handled. Their eyes meet. Marcus does not nod toward Prima. Lentulus does not look. Father and son perform the same informed nothing with a public synchrony no dancing master could have afforded.

A stone-carver is standing two veils to Antonia’s left with his whole family arranged around him as if by a frieze designer who understood sandwiches. He is pointing out his portion to a son too young to be corrupted by perspective. “There. The mules. I did the ears.”

“All of them?” the child asks.

“The ears. Lucius did the eyes because his father knew the foreman. Don’t let it go to the family head.”

The wife says, “Your grandfather did a cornucopia on the Basilica and still charged us for repairs. Art runs in the blood, along with invoicing.”

Antonia looks at the mules. The ears are excellent. It seems important, suddenly, that excellence can be local—an ear here, a stair counted there, a woman’s initials under a mark for payment purposes—and remain not less historical for declining to be visible from the top.

Near the base, women are doing what women do at imperial dedications: holding children, property, sunshades and the social knowledge of who in the neighbouring rows is likely to faint before the flutes reach the second sacrifice. A freedwoman in a green cloak is explaining the frieze to a younger woman with a basket by beginning not with Trajan but with the first bridge. “You start with how they got across,” she says. “The speeches are later and wash off.”

Antonia thinks, unbidden, of Saufia holding paper out of the rain; of the press-house woman writing initials learned from a son; of Daphne explaining money held for and money held from in her speaking voice; of Prima with copies folded for aprons. Rome is spiralling upward in low relief, but down here, at ankle height, another medium is doing the work: hands passing bread, documents, children, warnings, prices.

Eirene follows her glance with the accuracy of a woman who has been reading faces beside her since the Subura. “Don’t get civic, love. Not before the bread.”

“I am observing the freight.”

“Observe it fed.”

The purple-dealer, who has been pretending not to listen on principle, says: “If they’d carved the women who packed the armies, they’d have needed two more columns and a warehouse.”

“They carve sacks,” Prima says, from her station.

“Madam, you are ahead of the official guide.”

“It is a rule with monuments. Look where the man isn’t being worshipped.”

It gets a local laugh, brief and unattributable. On the official side the flutes proceed. At ground level, a fuller’s daughter by either bank gives instruction in how to read empire, and the stone does not fall.

Above them, bridged and battling, the narrative climbs into blur and godhood. Below, the carver’s wife is telling her son that his father’s mule-ears will outlast three dynasties unless a prefect decides stone is a tax in waiting. The child, reassured, goes back to his bread with the seriousness of a veteran.

Across the courtyard, in the lane that opens for them, the senators pass: Acilius, consular, benign; Postumus, telling a story to a priest's chin-strap; and Lentulus, in wool that still costs more than a horse, with Servilia beside him in grey that costs more than the horse's opinions. He does not look for Antonia. It is still a discipline. But as the lane closes he does something that only three people in the crowd can read — one of them baked this morning, one of them keeps three sets of books, and the third counts stitches with her mouth open — he touches, briefly, two fingers to the edge of his toga where the old scar's mirror-image would sit, under the left ear: not a sign, not a signal, only a man feeling for a fact on his own skin in a public place. Felix always leaves the scar. Some men like to think the decision is fresh every morning. He is not one of them anymore. The lane closes.

When the ceremony discharges them at last, the crowd does not disperse so much as change trades. Tourists become diners. Soldiers become grandfathers with improved geography. The stone-carver’s child is carried home asleep with bread still in one hand, one shoe retaining a suspicious quantity of forum dust that his mother says will be entered as an heirloom unless it gets on the good tunic.

Prima and Titus do not linger for the second stage of public admiration, which consists of men explaining to one another what they would have carved. The bakehouse has an afternoon order; history, in their household, is permitted but not allowed to spoil rising times. Prima pauses beside a stall selling copies of the dedication programme and buys none.

“You could keep one,” Titus says.

“I was there. I have the feet to prove it.”

“You keep other papers.”

“I keep papers people can act on.” She looks back up, once, to the men with baskets entering immortality at ground level. “I shall remember the sacks.”

At the margin, Eirene is folding the provisions cloth with the briskness of a retreat by an undefeated army. “You’ll be across the river by the guild hour?"

"If the bridge isn't full of historians," Titus says.

"The bridge is always full of historians. They just call the tolls different things."

Prima turns—not towards Antonia directly; the crowd has thinned and directness now would be a public claim—but into the general accounting shade where conversation can be held. "We have the feast coming," she says. "The guild wants the bakehouse to make more than bread this year. There may be an order for hangings beyond my household throne."

"Throne?" Eirene says.

"Mother Livia has corrected my vocabulary. I have a share, a room and a say in the benches."

"It qualifies," Antonia says.

"The house might lend the big hanging for the bakery door." Prima says it while watching a child lose a clay spiral to a drain. "If a loan can be entered respectably."

There it is: not the written message yet, the idea in advance of it, offered in a crowd where an answer can be anything and nothing. Antonia gives it the courtesy of no immediate gratitude. "The office has forms for respectable weather."

"Then I will write."

Titus, who has rescued the clay spiral by the expedient of a baker's reach, returns it to its owner and receives a stare of naked wonder. "Men with baskets," he says. "Practical at all altitudes."

Prima takes his elbow—not held by him this time, a small redrawing of force that only families and ladders notice—and they go with the river-bound crowd into a city returning, under its newest immortal spiral, to dinner.

By the afternoon the interior stair has already become Rome's newest way of telling people what kind of person they are. Those admitted by influence describe the climb as an honour. Those not admitted describe it as narrow. Stone-carvers describe it, accurately, as 185 steps and a nice piece of work in the dark.

Lentulus is offered access through the water board, whose engineers are being shown every new structure as if empire were a continuing professional seminar. Marcus says he should go. “It is our column now, whether we commissioned it or were upstaged by it.”

“You wish to come out above the war.”

“I wish to see whether the men with baskets are clearer from there.”

“They won’t be.”

“Then it is a fact I should collect at first hand. The family archive is short on collected facts.”

They go at a curated hour, with an engineer, a priest who dislikes stairs and a clerk whose lamp is probably the most honest expression of the state present. Inside, the spiral vanishes. The story becomes treads. Breath. The small windows cut for light giving ground-level Rome back in slices: a roof, a street where a mule is being unreasonable, a flash of river, a hill with houses whose names will not be read from any monument but are known in duplicate by the people who pay for their drainage.

Halfway up the priest asks whether the emperor’s genius is not most visible in forcing the narrative to turn around the reader.

Marcus says, from two steps above and in the new moderate voice that has destabilised three bathhouses, “It is visible in making us climb for it.”

Lentulus looks at the back of his son’s head in lamplight and thinks of a girl across the river counting red flowers so they can be read at the plane where another person’s hands will touch them. Stone wants altitude. Cloth wants eyes near enough to check the join. He does not say this. Ministerial silence, for once, is carrying load.

At the top Rome unrolls in the official direction and, less loyally, in all the others: hills, smoke, the Tiber taking light like a tray in the wrong hands. The clerk points out landmarks. The engineer points out the arcade lines instead, unglamorous and necessary, coming in over the gardens.

“There,” he says. “Your small lettering, senator. From up here it looks like water.”

It is the finest compliment an aqueduct can receive. Lentulus stays no longer than decorum requires. The city is beautiful from a height, but it is not, he has learned at a late course fee, thereby more truthful.

Cornelia watches the latter part of the dedication from the Avidian enclosure, where the harbour interest has arranged itself with better cushions than the nobility and a much more realistic supply of water. Her husband is explaining the frieze to a younger cousin by translating every military feature into tonnage. “That is not a siege tower,” he says, “that is a warehouse that has made a decision.”

She has been married long enough now to recognise which of his jokes are educational policy. This one is both.

Her music room floor has been repaired but retains, as he promised, a limited right of complaint under the stairs. The master is paid in advance, quarterly, in a schedule so irreproachable that even Servilia has run out of improvements to suggest at breakfast. Cornelia sings there most mornings. She does not sing today. A dedication is not a music room, and a young matron of two houses has learned which rooms are hers because other people are standing in them applauding a column.

And yet, as the flutes take a phrase she knows, she feels the Greek song enter her breath without knocking. Her mother is across an official distance in grey. Their eyes do not meet; Servilia has never wasted alliance-scale emotion on line of sight. Still, Cornelia puts both feet flat on the stone, the way Daphne once instructed her in a sentence delivered through three intermediaries and one argument about lemons.

Her husband notices. “The floor is not complaining here.”

“It is municipal. It has other management.”

“You look as if you might sing at it.”

“I am saving myself for rooms where the accounts are opened.”

He considers this with the care of a man who knows her sentences now sometimes have sisters behind them. “Should I be alarmed?”

“Only if your invoices are late.”

The joke goes through their marriage at the proper small scale, unrecorded. Below them Marcus is doing his public nothing. Her father is doing his older nothing with more expense of spirit. Her mother is being an institution in a veil. The whole family, Cornelia thinks, is being carved in a medium less permanent than stone and much harder to read from any single side.

She does not know yet what will be told her, or at whose table, or under which heading of family information arriving in the wrong century. She knows a box with copies in a room she can reach. She knows a husband who pays musicians on time and a mother who says partly as if it were a province to be governed with respect. She has begun to keep, in the box, a page of questions for which no adult has provided the order.

At the top, in her own hand, it says: Why does the house go quiet when the Caelian singer rests? Underneath, later and smaller: Why do I know the Greek tune in my breath before I have decided?

Questions are cheap to store. That is why families prefer them to answers. Cornelia folds the dedication programme around nothing in particular and keeps it anyway. Paper improves with the bearer.

■

That evening the house on the Caelian is full in its ordinary extraordinary way. The column's shadow, two hills away, is at that hour complimenting everything. Daphne sings a new song — Greek verses, a Roman setting, about a woman at a loom — and in the last stanza the faithful wife does the thing the poets have never yet permitted her: she presents her husband, home from the war at last, with the accounts. It gets the laugh and then it gets the silence, which in Antonia's room is the more expensive response. Men of business look into their cups. Someone says it will never play in the theatres, and Philomela, who has taken to harmony the way praetors take to distinguishing things, says that is because the theatres only sing the first frieze of everything, darling, the part where the emperor is still legible.

The song has been rehearsed all spring in the way dangerous material is rehearsed at the Caelian: first as technique, then as expense, then—when Eirene pronounced it “too true to survive before the fish”—as an after-course licence. Daphne found the Greek verses in a copy sold to her by a musician who had performed for sailors and widows and consequently understood both ends of the vowel. The Roman setting is hers and partly Philomela’s, who now sings harmony with the intellectual arrogance of a woman who has discovered that a second line can change a first one’s government.

“The wife waits,” Daphne explained at rehearsal, while Ammonius pretended not to be emotionally available in the doorway. “War, travels, storms, sirens—all the expensive weather. Then he comes home expecting an embrace with catering. She gives him the books.”

“Do the books balance?” Diomedes asked.

“That is the seduction scene.”

“Then it will play.”

In performance the joke lands because Daphne does not lean on it. She sings the faithful wife’s patience straight for three verses, giving the room time to admire its own mythology. Only in the last does the loom give way to household accounts: wool bought, debts refused, a suitor turned away by the simple expedient of presenting him with the cost of the roof. The husband’s homecoming is not diminished. It is audited.

The silence after the laugh has texture. Men look at cups, as noted by history. Women do not. A banker’s wife asks, too clearly, who wrote the last verse. Daphne says “a household”, which in the Caelian can mean a committee of survivors, and Philomela adds the harmony’s final note from behind the screen where she has been fulfilling a singer’s ancient right to appear at the most interpretive moment.

Later, when the guests have moved from culture back to finance, Daphne is offered money for the song by a man who wants it performed at his villa “without the accounts part.”

“Then it is a different song,” she says. “You may buy that one from tradition. It is heavily discounted and requires no thought after midnight.”

Diomedes, who is collecting respects in small change by the door, observes to Barbatus: “Our clause has acquired music.”

“It had lawyers before,” Barbatus says. “Music is cheaper and people remember the tune at doors.”

Antonia does not commission an encore. Some things should be allowed to go home in guests’ heads without a house receipt. She only tells Daphne, in passing, to add the song’s last verse to the copy kept with the renewed contracts.

“Under Educational?”

“Under Household Administration. We are an institution, not a college.”

Daphne, twenty-two and free three years and possessed of modest real stones in the Greek’s strongbox, considers the phrase with professional delight. “Then my accounts will be sung in the archive.”

“They are already the tune,” Philomela says. “Some of us merely harmonised.”

Earlier that evening, before the message, there is the ordinary crisis of a soup course delayed by a senator’s guest who has brought his own philosopher and expects the evening to be seasoned accordingly. Ammonius refuses to let philosophy near his stock. “It has been clarified,” he says. “It needs no worldview.”

Diomedes manages the delay by giving the philosopher a small room in the conversation, Greek only, and charging him in the older sense: attention from everyone he had hoped merely to dazzle. By the second course the man is asking Daphne why the loom song makes the room go quiet at its funniest line.

“Because an account is a love letter people can act on,” she says.

The philosopher writes this down. Diomedes writes down the fact that he has written it down. Civilisation proceeds by citation.

At the door, a tax inspector who is not on duty has come as somebody's brother-in-law and keeps catching himself admiring the door-book's categories. "Tradeswomen related by commission," he reads, under his breath, while Barbatus holds the lamp at a professional angle. "Elastic."

"Durable," says Barbatus. "It gets woven by the piece."

Only later does Antonia learn that the random censorious guest from last winter—the one who predicted the house would be closed by a committee and then attempted to dine at a discount on the strength of his error—has returned with his wife, having heard of Daphne's song from three separate outraged dinner parties. He applauds in the right places and leaves money under a napkin "for the singer's education." Diomedes returns half and keeps the correct fee. "Overpayment," he explains, "is an incomplete apology."

The young inspector who takes almond cakes as a matter of administrative routine is there too, on family business and off-duty enough to call the new stove by a pet name in front of witnesses. He asks Eirene whether institutions alter their paperwork as they age.

"They alter their memories first, dear," she says. "Paper only becomes honest when it notices."

It is into this fabric—music, stone dust still on the shoes of half the guests, philosophy demoted by soup, paperwork enjoying a social life—that the bakery message eventually finds its way like a bright thread through a sober ground.

Antonia moves through the rooms. The damp has not come through the courtyard wall this spring: a new drain, Cornelian-supervised, aqueduct-adjacent, invoice impeccable, sees to it. Diomedes books, in the second hand now more often than the first, total themselves with less arguing. The house will be registered, taxed, inspected by appointment, and let alone, which in Rome is the compound noun peace. At the hour when the guests begin to be steered, waterproofed, toward litters and back streets, Barbatus brings a folded message with no seal, and stands looking at it in his fist like a man who has finally been handed the last of a kind.

It is from Prima. — The shop has the guild feast. We will want the big room's hanging for the bakery door that day, if the house can lend what I sewed it. The child will be born by harvest, Titus says, who knows about rising. If it's a girl she will be taught letters before thread. If it's a boy, thread first, then letters, so he knows what the letters cost. At the foot, in the writing that Barbatus taught no one and Daphne taught her half of: I count everything so it doesn't count me. We're even, nearly. Which in the family, I'm told, is a kind of fortune.

Antonia stands in the doorway of the great dining room, where the hanging in question draws its red border round the evening. Eirene, passing with the lamps, says nothing, having spent thirty years learning the precise weight of that currency. Antonia folds the message once — precisely, as she has folded others, between the quarters of the tax receipts where all the important correspondence of her life has been filed since a young man taught her, among other thefts, the letter that begins her name. “Tell Barbatus,” she says, “the house will bring the hanging itself on the morning. By the front street. In a cart with ribbons, if the pastry cook's nephew can be trusted with colours.”

The message has come across the river in the late afternoon by a bakery boy who was paid in hot rolls at both ends and regards himself, not unreasonably, as an imperial courier in flour. Barbatus has kept it until the house reached the point in the evening when a mistress could receive family news without guests mistaking it for wine.

Antonia reads it the first time for logistics. Hanging. Bakery door. Guild feast. She is already instructing Diomedes silently about a cart when the sentence about the child crosses the room without asking admission.

She reads it the second time more slowly. If it’s a girl she will be taught letters before thread. If it’s a boy, thread first, then letters, so he knows what the letters cost. There is an entire education policy in it, also a joke at every man who ever held a mirror or a stylus over a woman’s life and called the accompanying invoice nature.

Eirene goes by with lamps and says nothing. Then, at the far end of the corridor, comes back without the lamps and says, “Well?”

“She is going to have a child by harvest.”

“Then harvest,” Eirene says, “will have to watch its manners.” She takes the folded paper from Antonia’s hand only to give it back in a better fold, a form of midwifery in any office. “Do not send money in a panic. Send the hanging. She asked for the hanging.”

“I know.”

“You have your knowing face. It worries the younger staff.”

Antonia looks into the great dining room where the red border is holding an evening of other people’s dynasties in a frame. The hanging has been worked by a woman who counted with her mouth open and stopped a room’s history in a doorway. It has belonged to a house that sells arrival as an experience. For one feast day it will go across a river and hang in a bakery door, where flour dust and guild weather will perform their own criticism.

“She wants it lent.”

“Then lend it like you mean it.” Eirene begins mentally marshalling carts. “Ribbons might frighten the flour, love.”

“The pastry cook’s nephew can be trusted with colours up to municipal level.”

“Can Barbatus?”

“He can be trusted to describe it later as a naval engagement.”

The answer Antonia will send is still forming. She does not write grandmother, a word whose paperwork Prima never promised to publish. She does not write daughter. The family has learned, painfully, to let nouns arrive at their own rates. What she writes that night, after the guests, in her own hand and with Diomedes refusing on principle to improve it, is an acceptance of the loan, terms for anchoring the hanging against bakery steam, and one line that costs her an administrative hour to keep this short: Tell the child, either model, the house keeps copies.

Diomedes reads it and makes no correction. “Entered under correspondence?”

“Under family,” Antonia says. “Between the quarters.”

“That heading is becoming untidy.”

“It is becoming a room.”

The lamps go up. The city does its night shift: bakers and fullers and clerks and column-carvers sleeping the sleep of the unnamed. Tomorrow there will be registrations, favourable winds for Avidian grain, a leaking arcade on the Praeneste road acquiring small unglamorous lettering, a wedding or a funeral or a girl with a mirror learning to read over somebody's shoulder the exact words that will one day be the beginning of her. Rome is the mistress of the known world, says the inscription programme. It is also, says the house, settling its accounts by lamplight, quarterly, in three hands, a fuller’s daughter at either end of it, holding.

Chapter Twenty-Five

Every Favour a Debt

. . .

A year is not an ending. Rome disapproves of endings; it has aqueducts instead. Things arrive where the maps claimed they did, late, by gravity and maintenance, and the city drinks without inquiring into the small unglamorous lettering. But a house keeps its own calendar. A house counts from the morning the damp came through a wall in the shape of a country it had never been to, and from an inspection notice left before dawn, and from the sound — still the truest minute Antonia owns, more reliable than any portent the colleges sell — of a needle going in, and coming out, and the flowers along a border learning how to be the same and not the same.

So let the record, in whichever hand survives the quarter, close the books on the following. The child across the river is born by harvest, a girl, in the lean-to room above the vats where frankly so much of the century was laundered. She is called, after business in the family that the baker's mother calls respect and Daphne calls orchestration, Lucia Vibia — the river first, the light before it, paperwork after a decent interval — and she has a thumbprint, if a person were fanciful, on the inside of one wrist, and she will be taught letters before thread by women competing on the point like rival firms. The bakehouse flourishes at the rate of honest weight. The hanging with the red flowers goes back and forth across the bridges on feast days until the neighbourhood begins to date things by it, which is how traditions, like debts, acquire the patina of having been inevitable.

The birth, when it comes, has the decency to come after the guild feast and before the worst of harvest weather. This is entered by Mother Livia as the child’s first act of household cooperation and therefore as a promising sign. The hanging has been brought across in a cart with Barbatus walking beside it like an honour guard who has seen too much history to be trusted with perspective. For one day the red flowers have framed a bakery door through which half of Transtiberim has passed carrying baskets, babies, toolboxes and opinions. The Caelian house sent no representative more controversial than Barbatus and a quantity of almond cakes listed as samples. The samples were inspected like hems and destroyed by acclamation.

By the time Lucia arrives, her curriculum has already been settled by four generations of women in two postal districts. Letters before thread. It is Prima's sentence, but Claudia's handwriting is all over its ancestry and Antonia's tenderly withheld applause all over her restraint. Titus, faced with a daughter whose thumb rests during sleep in a position suspiciously like someone testing pressure, announces that she will also learn weights. "Letters, thread and whether a man is shorting the flour," he says. "After that, poetry can queue."

The name takes longer. Names do, in families that know how much damage a tidy inscription can do. Lucia for the light, say some. Vibia for the house that already knows how to keep her. Nothing from the Palatine, no ancestral stone unloaded onto a person currently engaged chiefly in appetite and volume. Marcus, informed by a channel so indirect it might legally qualify as weather, sends no name. He sends later, from far away, writing tablets of a quality Prima inspects silently and puts away because a gift need not be accepted at its sender's pace to be retained.

Antonia does not attend in any capacity the neighbours could be asked to describe. She sends what is asked for, which turns out to be linen whose seams Eirene has pronounced too good for any infant likely to respect them, and a small hoard of coin entered through the guild as a customer's customary present for feast work. Every instinct trained by a life of surviving rooms wants to make the gift larger. She does not. Prima has not asked to be carried. She has asked—by every sentence she has ever put into Antonia's office—to be counted correctly.

On the third day, a note arrives at the Caelian not through a courier but with the bread order, folded between an invoice and a list of cushions for repair:

Born Tuesday. Girl. Loud. Titus says defective silence encouraging. Letters before thread agreed across all departments. The child has your way of looking at a room before deciding whether to pay for it.

There is no signature. The hand is enough.

Diomedes reads it because Antonia gives it to him to read, which is a new category in their working lives: documents surrendered by choice before they can leak. “A favourable report,” he says.

“File it with the hanging loan.”

“The third book suggests a more durable heading.”

“The third book,” Antonia says, “is between quarters.”

“So is the item, madam.”

It goes there. Some histories melt. This one is given a slightly better room.

Marcus goes, at summer's end, as a junior officer to an eastern staff, not his father's war, which has gone to safer hands, but a real one, with baskets. He writes home in Latin of steadily improving plainness. From Antioch he writes once to Transtiberim: three lines, no Greek beyond a place-name, and an unsuitable present of writing tablets for a niece not yet born when he sent them, which Prima puts with her tools, evidence admissible at last. Cornelia, from a house that no longer leaks into the dining room, becomes the Avidii's connection to every singer in Rome worth paying properly, and corresponds — through the house's careful channels, at the usual rates of sororal paperwork — with a needlewoman of remarkable hems whose trousseau work her household commissions above the market. The letter in which she first guesses why is never sent. Servilia, who has scheduled everyone else's acts of this drama for nineteen years, sends instead, on the suitable feast, a recipe request. It comes back copied in Diomedes second hand, the one things live in. The pastry cook, learning that Servilia has made his almond cakes for a committee of aqueduct widows, takes to calling himself the pastry cook to two empires, and has to be sat on, kindly and specifically, by both.

Marcus's departure is the first family ceremony at which no one tries to improve the cast by leaving somebody out of the reported version. He goes east not to a governorship wrapped in ancestral expectation but to a staff appointment where his duties include supply returns, interpreters and the mapping of roads that exist mostly as opinions held by tired men. Servilia sees to his equipment as if outfitting a province she may need to repossess. Lentulus sees to his debts, which is more loving and less photogenic.

Onesimus packs a spare cloak strap without being told. It has been mended by a needlewoman across the river at trade rates and finished during a series of transactions nobody at the Palatine is expected to declaim at breakfast.

"You will write plainly," Servilia instructs him at the gate. "Greek is for showing Athens you were educated. Latin is for telling your mother whether your socks correspond to the manifest."

"Mother, the army has quartermasters."

"The army has quartermasters in the way this family has clerks. Their existence is not a substitute for accuracy."

Lentulus gives him no deathless family sentence. The cupboard under his grandfather's mask contains a letter in Latin with four lines in it and a sealed tablet whose terrible imperative has lately stopped shouting. He says, "Do nothing where other men's names are spoken that you would not enter in your own hand."

Marcus hears the riverine arithmetic in it and does not disfigure the moment by attribution. "Noisily," he says.

"Preferably not during a night march."

The letters improve as promised. They begin full of roads. They become, over months, interested in the men who move baskets along them. At Antioch, in a room where the heat enters through every architectural boast, Marcus writes to Transtiberim with the third-person discipline of a man who has learned the price of putting himself at the head of other people's weather. He sends tablets "for accounts when required" and does not mention an unborn child because he does not know, yet, in a form he is entitled to act on. Fate, receiving this, registers a small protest at the loss of its usual office.

Servilia reads his home letters and annotates the supply figures. Lentulus reads them and says less each time, which in their household is becoming the sound of a man contributing accurately. In one, Marcus writes: The general is much praised for the river crossing. The river was crossed by engineers who had been up since the fourth hour and a Syrian woman who told us which landing would not eat the mules. We put the praise where the despatch could reach it. I am learning.

Lentulus takes this letter into the atrium and stands for a while among the masks, not seeking permission. He puts it, after a considered moment, not in the cupboard, but in the ordinary family archive where a clerk can retrieve it during business hours. Progress, in the Cornelii, has begun to look like filing.

Cornelia's first letter to Prima is not, properly speaking, a letter. It is an order, routed through a Secretary, for two lengths of work suitable for a west-facing room: measurements, light, the warning that red can be reduced. Prima's estimate comes back in her firm hand with thread separately costed and an unimpeachable sentence about hanging in strong sun. They correspond for some months as women in Rome often do, by making a commercial instrument carry more weather than its face declares.

Only later does a second enclosure begin to appear, on smaller paper: a question about a song's refrain, a note that the music floor still speaks under the stairs, a request—phrased as household interest—whether a certain stitch can be made to disappear while still holding. Prima answers at invoice length. Sometimes shorter. The household gods of Transtiberim are not consulted on fashion, and Mother Livia reads nothing she has not been given with intent.

Cornelia's unsent letter lives in her box for most of a season. She takes it out after evenings when the family silence has taken a particular shape across a table. She has written, on the first attempt, an appalling amount of Greek, because strong feeling in her class comes with metre pre-installed. On the second she has written: I think I know why my mother's house goes quiet when I sing a line about accounts. On the third, simply: May I ask the order of the questions?

She does not send any of them. Not from cowardice—Cornelia has begun paying musicians in advance and growing a backbone under management—but from a sudden, mature suspicion that ignorance can also be other people's room. Perhaps Prima has not been waiting to be solved by a sister in a west-facing house. Perhaps a question, sent at the wrong rate, is a demand dressed for dinner.

Servilia sees the page of questions while helping her daughter select which papers should travel on an Avidian estate visit. She reads the top line because it is there and because mothers, even in the fourth ledger, retain vast powers of accidental reconnaissance.

"Keep them at the front of the box," she says.

"Mother."

"I am not answering. I am approving storage." She closes the lid. "When a thing is told for your benefit, Cornelia, it will not be delivered by musicians."

"Is that a promise of a date?"

"It is a promise of subject matter."

Cornelia almost laughs. "You are becoming less governed."

"I am governing smaller territories. It looks like softness from the provinces."

That week Servilia sends, through correct channels and at a respectable hour, a request for the recipe for almond cakes. It is addressed to a house in the abstract, as if recipes arose spontaneously among institutions. The reply comes copied clearly, with quantities, by Diomedes in the hand that allows things to live. There is also, in Eirene's inimitable afterthought delivered verbally through Barbatus, an instruction to let the committee wife beat the mixture until it changes its politics.

Servilia makes the cakes herself—supervised by a kitchen staff browsing catastrophe—for an assembly of widows concerned with fountain repairs. They are pronounced excellent by women whose husbands used to complain about taxes and are now, through widowhood and improved pressure, allocating them. She sends no acknowledgement. A week later a second request arrives at the Caelian for the name of the almond supplier.

Diomedes enters it under Correspondence.

“Not family?” Eirene asks.

“Not between the quarters.”

Antonia hears, and for once makes no suggestion about the accounts.

Lentulus grows older the way his family goes into decline: with great dignity and improved water pressure. His name is spoken in baths, as steam; it is carved, also, in small letters where things work. Hadrian comes home from Athens and the future clanks gently up the Palatine in Greek dress; the emperor goes east to his war at last, to the drum-rolls of the stone yards, and the old men who stayed behind to mind the city's plumbing find themselves, to their discreet surprise, in something resembling favour. It lifts nobody to a column. It keeps the fountains running. Lentulus, inspecting an arcade in the second spring, is heard by an engineer to say that history is mostly maintenance and the rest is scaffolding. The engineer, who wears foreign trousers and has read exactly the legible part of the frieze, reports this in the baths as philosophy. It does the rounds. It reaches the Caelian in the door-book version by noon.

The following spring finds Lentulus on the Praeneste road with mud drying into pale maps on his cloak and a work party informing him that the arcade he has come to inspect has decided, in his absence, to become two arcades separated by an aspiration. This is the engineer’s phrase. The foreman’s is shorter and involves gods with weak ankles.

Servilia has travelled out with him by carriage because the widows’ fountain committee—an institution created accidentally out of almond cakes and municipal despair—requires an inspection of its own. She sits in the shade of a market gardener’s awning with three widow-administrators and a bowl of early fruit, extracting from the district representative a timetable so exact that the man begins to take notes on his own excuses.

Lentulus watches from a distance with the cautious awe of a husband who has seen his wife annex a province by catering. “She has a staff now,” he tells the engineer.

“They appear to have been elected by complaints,” the engineer says. “It is the soundest franchise on the road.”

The leak, when found, is not where the maps indicate. It is where a woman who sells onions under the arcade says the ground “thinks wet” before rain. They dig. She is right. Her name is entered on the work return because Lentulus orders it and because the clerk has by now learned that an order from this curator, where names are concerned, is written in the mood of a man who has seen cupboards.

Servilia, informed at lunch, says, “We shall make an office of you yet.”

“I am an office.”

“No, Gnaeus. You are becoming a clerk with ancestry. It is a more useful creature.”

The onion seller’s name is later misspelled on an inscription plaque. Lentulus has it corrected. The correction costs more than sentiment and less than an arch. It is the kind of arithmetic nobody in the baths will ever quote in verse.

Hadrian’s return brings the usual re-sorting of invitations. A dinner now arrives for Lentulus wearing a warmer seal. He accepts some, refuses those that coincide with inspection days, and is reported by an old colleague to have become “difficult to flatter on an empty stomach”. Whether this indicates favour in the new climate or a private revolution in digestion, Rome debates and files under Health.

At one of these dinners a younger courtier asks, too smilingly, whether the famous clause was intended as law or autobiography. The table becomes aware of knives.

Lentulus says, “It was intended as a sentence. Women made it legible. The rest is maintenance.”

The phrase travels, as we know. It reaches Barbatus by noon in the simplified form history is drainage, which he delivers while changing a lamp seal. Antonia, hearing it in the correct full version from Diomedes at evening, makes no correction to the public record. Some intellectual property is best allowed to leak.

Across the river, the child acquires a calendar of women. There is the baker’s mother, who regards sleep as a municipal resource and has ideas about its allocation. There are guild women with practical views on swaddling and subversive views on priests. There is a widowed neighbour whose contribution is chiefly to sit near the cradle looking severe at any man who imagines a baby in a working house should be made compatible with his notion of silence.

Prima goes back to work by instalments: estimates at the table, fine work when Lucia permits, teaching a younger fuller’s girl how to make stitch disappear without making the argument look dishonest. She prices the teaching. This scandalises exactly one guild official, who is bought off by the discovery that his own daughter wishes to enrol.

“Education,” Mother Livia says at the hearing, “has become a tradeswoman. I hope the city is paying attention to what arrives at its name.”

Letters arrive too, at intervals no one mistakes for an invasion. Cornelia’s commissions carry a marginal household weather. Marcus’s tablets are now used for Lucia’s accounts—receipts, weights, a fastidious record of which relations by bakery, guild and invoice have brought useful objects during the first quarter of a life. Prima signs nothing on her daughter’s behalf except the facts. Even facts, she has reason to know, need supervision.

One Tuesday the work-box comes to the Caelian with a tiny woollen cap in it awaiting a seam. Lucia does not. The separation is deliberate and, Antonia thinks, educational for everybody queuing inside her own ribs. Prima mends the cap while they talk of strong sun and reduced red.

At the door she says, “She has discovered counting.”

“At five months?”

“She watches fingers as if a customs officer is doing something unreliable.”

“An inherited scepticism.”

“Taught,” Prima says. “We are a great family for acquiring characters by watching the room.”

Antonia gives her the revised estimate and no surplus wisdom. Barbatus carries the work to the street cart. The cap goes home in the box, completed, with no hidden flower at all. Sometimes a seam is merely a seam. The house is learning the difference between underwriting a life and leaving a signature in its lining.

There is a will now. There has always been a will—Antonia is not a woman who would leave Rome to compose her posthumous intentions in its own hand—but it has been revised by the Greek in a room so small that death itself would have to sit correctly. Eirene receives money and the right to choose her own address, which she announces will remain wherever the soup is properly seasoned. Diomedes receives an annuity and the care of archive categories no one else can be trusted to pronounce. Barbatus receives enough to retire into a door of his own, an idea he treats as a security risk.

The women’s savings remain unambiguously theirs, with a sentence inserted at Antonia’s insistence after the banker suggested that clarity could sometimes be detrimental to flexibility. “Flexibility,” she said, “is what a hinge does after other people have installed the lock. Write it straight.”

The house itself goes into an arrangement of shares, stewards and conditions too dull for any poet to steal. Daphne, if she wishes, will have an interest in the music side. Philomela’s funeral harmonies are to be encouraged by capital, within rates. The office copies are to survive whichever tax regime thinks itself eternal.

“Is there,” the Greek asks, with his face wiped to its banking level, “a family acknowledgment I should expect in another document?”

“There are acknowledgments in every document she has signed this year,” Antonia says. “None requires your office to hold its breath.”

He accepts this. Prima, by the name that has done the work,has her own papers. If an additional bequest ever travels, it will do so under instructions that survive public explanation. No child of either bank is to be surprised into dynasty by a seal after somebody’s funeral.

“Your late instructions,” the Greek says, “are structurally unromantic.”

“They are load-bearing.”

“A distinction history underrates.”

That night Antonia tells Eirene only the part concerning soup tenure. Eirene, who has known since the Subura when Antonia is consulting death as another difficult guest, says: “Are you ill, love?”

“I am in my forties and own property near drains.”

“So: mortal, with paperwork.”

“At the full rate.”

“Then set another cover in the dining room. I am not having us mourn your legibility before dinner.”

There are things the record cannot close, and the accountant in Antonia is learning to distinguish an open column from an unfinished wound. Cornelia still does not know in the first hand. She knows in the way a room knows a floorboard complains: by shifts in weight, by subjects that take a side door, by a mother who says partly and a brother whose letters grow plainer when certain names are absent. If a conversation waits for her in a music room of her own, it is not this book’s appointment to force the hour. Prima, too, has not asked for the estate paper sealed among poetry-proof items. The seal remains. It has become almost polite.

Marcus is still across a moving map. Letters cross the empire faster than justice and slower than appetite. Trajan’s war will find its own outcome; men with baskets will pay at whatever rate glory is currently demanding. One day he may come home with a Syrian woman’s accurate sense of landing-places in his sentences and ask a question of his sister in Latin. Or not. The empty space at the end of his correspondence is currently occupied, correctly, by discipline.

Lentulus will inspect more water. It is not a redemption pageant. Some mornings he is merely an ageing senator with a cough in damp weather and opinions about contractors. Some evenings Servilia finds him in the study with the plain notebook open to persons to whom precision is owed, adding a clerk, an onion seller, a son-in-law's father who was right about tides. The list is growing less patrician and more administratively sound. She corrects the spelling and says nothing about furniture.

And in Transtiberim a first daughter of the new order will be argued over by rival firms of literacy: guild women with ink, a baker with weights, a mother with a needle, a grandmother by invoices who has learned the usefulness of not arriving. At some point a child will be able to read a contract before she is expected to be improved by other people's summaries. If Rome notices, it will call it a decline in manners. If Rome survives it, it will call it tradition before the child is twenty.

Houses, unlike empires, do not have to be completed to be their own records. They leak, they are maintained, they change what counts as an interior. The books are therefore left, after all, not closed but straight—and the distinction, filed between quarters in the second hand, will have to serve.

By the second spring the clause has acquired what all successful Roman innovations acquire: a nickname, three wrong attributions and a stationer's edition with commentary nobody admits to needing. Saufia comes to the Caelian at the trades entrance with her cousin's daughter and a bundle of papers tied this time in red thread. The cousin is taking work in a house whose proprietor speaks of savings as if he invented the weather around them.

"I am not asking for charity," Saufia says, before soup can be deployed in her direction. "I am asking for Diomedes at reading speed."

Diomedes reads. The girl—twenty, sharp about cloth measurements and raw about documents—stops him at retention against contingencies. “Meaning he keeps it if anything happens?”

“Meaning anything he can name afterwards,” Saufia says. “We have had that rain.”

Antonia, present because a proprietor’s presence at this stage in her life can shorten some negotiations and lengthen the right ones, says nothing until the girl asks whether a copy can be left with someone outside the house. “It can,” she says. “It should. Bring back the version with the wording changed.”

The girl returns three days later with retention amended, quantities named, and a rhythm about her that Eirene classifies as a family trait of the recently documented. She does not take the work in the end. A fuller’s guild place opens, less glamorous, better lit. Saufia tells the story in advance of other versions: no torch, just weatherproof paper and a woman who had been told where to get it read.

That is the clause as history. Not a column. A route women tell one another between market stalls, an address in a song’s second hearing, a sentence forwarded at half price and eventually, in the great Roman manner, copied without anyone needing to remember which Cornelius was once afraid of it.

In Antonia books it is entered under Educational one last time. Diomedes considers the heading. “The category has outgrown its room.”

“Then let it be infrastructure,” she says. “Rome will read it better in small letters.”

■

And the house. Let the record show the house. Registered, taxed, inspected by appointment, its women signing their contracts with a clause in their own hands at the foot — Daphne first, in letters big enough for auditors, Philomela with a flourish praetors would call distinguishing. The library of names the city is convinced it keeps, it keeps exactly as it ever kept them: in Antonia's memory, unminuted, ageing like wine rather than wax. What has changed, if the aediles cared to measure a doorway they no longer measure, is that the house has begun to be described at dinners as respectable. Antonia treats the word the way her house treats glass jewellery: she acknowledges the intention and returns it beautifully. Respectability is a lane that opens. She has spent twenty-one years learning how lanes close. She will take the peace and keep the paperwork.

The house has acquired other, smaller revolutions under cover of becoming respectable. Daphne is teaching two mornings a week now: a banker's niece with a stepmother problem and the daughter of a freed silk merchant whose Latin is excellent and whose respectability can be purchased by the half-hour. Her fees are paid into the strongbox in amounts she reports to Eirene as if filing dispatches from a successfully defended border.

"I am becoming capital," she says.

"You are becoming less available for tragedy," Eirene says. "Capital is a side effect."

Philomela, whose flourish on her renewed contract would have caused a praetor to use the word distinguishing beyond his usual workload, has begun arranging harmonies for a group of women who sing at private funerals. "Grief pays promptly," she explains. "And nobody asks for an encore in the atrium."

A new musician arrives in spring with references, talent and an immediate instinct for the house's filing of men according to how they behave around closed doors. She is twenty-six, from Tarentum, and wants her savings held where a husband cannot give them a tour of his debts. Antonia lays out the contract. The clause is cited. The musician reads it twice and asks the question that has become, in the Caelian admissions office, more reliable than an audition: "Who besides me has a copy?"

"The Greek. The registry. Diomedes in triplicate, which is a small country."

"And if I leave in weather?"

“Settle promised work where people have paid for it. Take what is yours.”

“Do many leave?”

“Not since the front door started appearing in the documents.”

She signs, then plays something so cleanly that Ammonius comes out of the kitchen against all pastry discipline and stands with flour on one forearm like a sailor sighting home. “Hire her before the sauce notices,” he says.

She is hired. Her first public appearance is at a dinner where an aedile’s inspector is present as a private brother-in-law and tries, from force of administrative habit, to look official during the fish. Barbatus serves him wine with enough courtesy to disable a border post.

Later, in the accounts, Diomedes enters the evening under Ordinary Extraordinary. Antonia questions the category.

“It is where the house keeps events,” he says, “that are no longer news and not yet routine.”

“Peace, in working dress.”

“Peace does not itemise, madam. We remain its Secretary.”

The last evening, before the courtyard minute, has its own small fullness of incidents requiring no committee. A Spanish olive merchant arrives with a cousin and a grievance against shipping. A senator’s widowed sister, new to eating in complex houses since the word respectable began doing her family’s thinking for it, listens to Daphne’s loom song and sends a message to the kitchen for Diomedes. She wants, not the recipe, but the name of a good banker who will explain a statement without patting it.

Diomedes gives her the Greek and warns that the room is smaller than expected.

“Most useful rooms are,” she says. It goes into the door-book as an unattributed advance in civilisation.

Ammonius launches a sauce that causes two guests to propose marriages to separate relatives of his and one to propose a trading partnership. He declines all offers on the grounds of artistic solvency.

Eirene removes an arena-grade drunk from the doorway by addressing him as a former colleague of Barbatus, which is historically inaccurate and operationally perfect.

At the main table the conversation turns, inevitably, to the emperor in the east. The war is discussed in the new style: with maps, confidence and an occasional uncharacteristic pause when somebody says supply. A young officer home on leave says the men marching out of Antioch now ask after letters "in plain Latin" from their families because quick meanings travel better in heat. This reaches Antonia through two courses and a pantry door. She says nothing. The house has learned not to make itself the footnote to its own evening.

Barbatus, at the street, encounters a girl with a tray who is running plates between two houses because her employer's dinner ambitions have exceeded his domestic furniture. She almost drops a polished platter at the sight of a chair procession. He steadies it—not the girl, the tray—and tells her to hold it by the weight, not the shine.

Eirene sees this from the doorway and says, later, in the kitchen where all of Rome is revised: "That is the whole curriculum."

"Enter it under Educational," says Diomedes.

"Under Housekeeping," says Antonia. "We are respectable now. We can let the truth in by the trade entrance first."

On the last evening this record keeps — for houses, like columns, must declare a dedication date somewhere, or the scaffolding never comes down — the lamps are being trimmed, Diomedes is failing, on purpose, to notice Eirene correcting his Greek by ear, Barbatus is telling the night porter a story whose dishonest preamble has achieved its final, perfected length, and Antonia Cassia, who was born with nothing worth the law's remembering, stands in her own courtyard with her hand flat to a wall that has stayed dry a full year along a drain whose lettering nobody will ever read. From the great room, the sound of women counting — stitches, bars, coins, stairs — comes as it has always come in this house, under the music, like the true plumbing.

She does not, that evening, make a speech. The house would have minuted it in three hands and ruined the fish. But in the passage between courtyard and dining rooms she passes the place where damp once came through in the shape of an unvisited country and remembers January's arithmetic: inspection before dawn; Barbatus in the doorway; the Greek's rooms arranged like truths; a girl with a border and a singer with a laugh; a man in a chair smelling of ashes; all the ordinary fear of a woman who had built one life at full price and did not intend to have it surveyed by amateurs.

The wall is dry. It will not be dry forever. That is not pessimism, it is building management. Roofs go. Drains silt. Young men discover new geometries and have to be fed through them. A house is not a monument delivered from time; it is a local arrangement with time, serviced by people who know which stair complains and what a name looks like when it is being kept by its owner.

Diomedes is at the office table, closing one book and not the others. "The inspector has sent next quarter's date," he says. "An appointment so firm it amounts to flirtation."

"Give him the almond cakes."

"Already minuted."

"And no doorway measuring unless he requests it as entertainment."

"The schedule has a column."

Eirene, whose hair has taken another colour toward iron this year and whose authority has compensated by darkening, comes through with a tray that is absolutely not a mirror. "Are we looking at walls for our morale now?"

"I am inspecting an asset."

"Inspect one that can be eaten. There is a lamb developing strategy."

From the great room Daphne begins the loom song, not the whole thing—three bars, a cap placed on the evening, for people who know. Somebody laughs before the accounting verse because some guests have become regular enough to have anticipations. It is, Antonia thinks, the most harmless form of tradition: a joke arriving in a place that has learned to hold its silences correctly.

She goes in to dinner by the front of the room, not the trades side. A small geography. Hers.

In Rome, every favour creates a debt. She has made a life, and a house, and — in the third set of books, the real one, filed between the quarters among unsigned notes and one folded message about ribbons — a family, out of knowing to the last figure what the debts were. Every secret carries a price: she has paid hers in the only coin that kept its value in the getting, which was work, done on the ground, in season, by name. And the past, however carefully buried —— the past came back across a bridge one Tuesday at a time with a work-box, and sat in the courtyard, and counted with its mouth open, and asked for nothing but thread at its own prices.

She takes her hand off the wall. The plaster is warm now, evening-warmed, hers. Somewhere across the river a child is being counted to sleep. Somewhere on the Palatine an old man is choosing, nightly, at compound interest, better. In the Forum, above them all, a stone war climbs toward a pot of gold ashes and the one perfect view; and at its foot, unregarded, the men with baskets hold up, as they always have, the legible beginning of everything.

“The books are straight,” Diomedes says from the doorway, in the second hand, the one for things that must look boring to survive.

“Then we are even, nearly,” Antonia said. “In this city that's a fortune. Put the lamps up. Rome is coming to dinner.”

. . .

The End